The VICE-PRESIDENT. This completes the Pension Calendar.

JOSEPH A. BLANCHARD.

Mr. KEAN. There are some bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to correct military records which should be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Were they reported to-day?

Mr. KEAN. There was one that was reported to-day, to correct the military record of Joseph A. Blanchard. I happen to be interested in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There was one bill to correct a military record reported to-day, which was passed upon the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. KEAN. There was also another military-record bill reported to-day which I did not ask to have considered at the time the report was made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not appear on the printed Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. No; I am aware of that Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 334) to correct the military record of Joseph A. Blanchard.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Joseph A. Blanchard, late first lieutenant of Troop E, First New York Mounted Rifles, and to grant him an honorable discharge to date from July 26, 1864; but no pay, bounty, or other allowances shall become due and payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that Thursday, the 22d instant, be set apart instead of to-morrow for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on War Claims. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On March 14, 1906:

H. R. 13674. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, and so forth, approved March 3, 1901,' approved June 30, 1902."

On March 15, 1906:

H. R. 13673. An act to extend the provisions of the homestead laws to certain lands in the Yellowstone Forest Reserve.

RAILWAY DISCRIMINATIONS AND MONOPOLIES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution 115.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 115) amending joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time, approved March 7, 1906.

Resolved, etc., That joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time, approved March 7, 1906, is hereby amended by adding the following thereto:

Ninth. To enable the Commission to perform the duties required and accomplish the purposes declared herein, the Commission shall have and exercise under this joint resolution the same power and authority to administer oaths, to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and to obtain full information, which said Commission now has under the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto now in force or may have under any like statute taking effect hereafter. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said act to regulate commerce and by "An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission in cases under or connected with an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and amendments thereto," approved February 11, 1893, shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority herein conferred.

Tenth. The sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated and added to the appropriation of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the present fiscal year.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

On page 2, in line 19, after the word "dollars," insert "be, and the same;" and in line 22, after the word "appropriated," insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

On page 2, in line 23, strike out the words "and added," and insert in lieu thereof "in addition."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission is ready to proceed with this investigation and are now preparing to submit estimates as to the expense of the investigation, and that the Committee on Appropriations is to look after the appropriation. I therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out lines 21 to 25, inclusive, on page 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the lines specified.

Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have the amendment reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the lines proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last paragraph of the resolution, which reads as follows: "Tenth. The sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in addition to the appropriation of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the present fiscal year."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield for a moment, I wish to state for the information of the House that the Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission called upon the Committee on Appropriations yesterday, under direction of the chairman of the Commission, and stated that they were preparing estimates as to the cost of this investigation, and that, roughly speaking, these estimates will show that cost to be at least $150,000; that $50,000 would not be sufficient. Upon inquiry I learn that the Interstate Commerce Commission could make a reasonably certain estimate and that it will submit its estimate to the Committee on Appropriations or to Congress asking for an appropriation covering the entire investigation.

Thinking that is the better plan, for the reason that then in the future we can pass upon the expenditure of this money, we have requested that the matter be left for the Committee on Appropriations to handle. We can then provide for the entire amount estimated for by the department for this purpose and also attach certain limitations in regard to reporting the expenditures from the appropriation to Congress.

Mr. DALZELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. It seems to me from a cursory examination of this resolution that this is merely a reenactment of these two acts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is in accordance with the suggestion of the President of the United States.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In which he suggests that the resolution which we adopted with relation to the Interstate Commerce Commission did not through the amendment confer the power that we sought to confer upon the Commission. And, while we do not assent to the statement that the power does not already exist, we do feel that it is better, inasmuch as the President and the Attorney-General has suggested a doubt, to remove that doubt by enacting an amendment making it perfectly plain.

Mr. DALZELL. I see.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not oppose the amendment to the resolution or this amendment to this resolution; but in my judgment it is entirely unnecessary. I think the President had been badly informed when he sent to the Congress the message which he did, connected with the statement that he had signed the original resolution. Section 12 of the interstate-commerce act provides that—

> The Commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted, and shall have the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the Commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created.

Mr. Speaker, under that section of the law the Interstate Commerce Commission under the original law had authority to inquire into every act of the common carriers whether engaged in the transportation of coal or oil or any other commodity. It was given an extensive power, as extensive as it is possible to give by words in the English language. The Commission under the act could have instituted this inquiry on its own motion under the law as it existed. The original resolution passed by this House was simply a direction to the Commission to exercise the law already upon the statute books. Full power was given to the Commission to make an investigation, to subpœna witnesses, to call before the Commission not only witnesses who are railroad officials, but witnesses who might know anything about the subject, from whatever business in life; and, in my judgment, the President was illy informed in reference to the existing law when he sent his message to Congress.

Now, personally, Mr. Speaker, I think the Commission ought to be engaged in other business. I certainly think it is wise to have an investigation at any time for the acquirement of information; but I believe with most gentlemen who have considered this subject, probably including the gentleman who now presents it to the House himself, that the Commission ought to be engaged in enforcing other provisions of the law and let somebody else investigate these charges in relation to railroads being controlled in the interest of coal and oil trusts.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman not get the impression from the President's message upon the Tillman resolution that the President is of the opinion that the resolution contemplated an independent investigation, both of the coal and oil industries, without any regard to transportation?

Mr. MANN. Well, I can not say what the impression of the President might be; but undoubtedly the purpose of Congress in passing the resolution was to have an investigation of the coal and oil business as related to transportation. We have another Department of the Government given the power under existing law to make an investigation of the coal and oil business apart from transportation. That is the Bureau of Corporations, in the Department of Commerce and Labor; and I understand that it has already made an investigation of the oil business, and has had under consideration an investigation of the coal combine.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I can not understand why the President should treat the resolution in the manner that he did, unless he gave it the interpretation that I have suggested.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know why the President treated it as he did. From my experience of departmental methods, I suppose some $1,000 clerk in the Department of Justice gave an opinion, without knowing what the law was, that the resolution was not sufficiently broad, and this opinion, in the course of its peregrinations, reached the Attorney-General and the President and was given out. We all know that sort of thing is constantly happening. It is not the fault of any official, and certainly not of the President.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to say just a word in answer to the gentleman from Illinois. I agree with the gentleman in what he has said upon the original resolution; but I believe that, inasmuch as the President has taken the position that the original resolution was not broad enough, it is evidently the part of wisdom for us to make no mistake in withholding ample authority. The Commission ought to have the power necessary to perform the duties which we impose upon it. It may have, and I am inclined to believe does have, such power now, but it will be better to reconfer it in express terms than to take any chances. And now that a doubt has been raised by so high an authority let us resolve it by passing this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to submit a report in accordance with House resolution No. 120, on the subject of alleged abuses of the franking privilege. I move the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, a resolution of the House directed the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to make a certain investigation. That investigation has been made and the committee reports back.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the report to be read?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The report is not long, and it should be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. SIBLEY. It is the unanimous report of the committee, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report. Having read all except the exhibits attached thereto—

Mr. SIBLEY said: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the report be dispensed with and that the entire report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SIBLEY. The report and the testimony accompanying it.

The SPEAKER. And the testimony accompanying the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will this be printed as a document in the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. MANN. It is difficult to read in the small type in which it appears in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the resolution.

The report was read, as follows:

[House Report No. 2332, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

On January 4, 1906, the House of Representatives adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to investigate whether or not there are or have been abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress or in the name of Members of Congress."

At the time of the consideration of the resolution in the House, as appears from the RECORD of January 4, 1906, at page 673 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, what purported to be an editorial printed in the Washington Post was read and made a part of the record. This editorial was in the following language:

"We quite agree that something ought to be done for the relief of the Post-Office Department. Its work is simply tremendous and, by an interesting coincidence, its usefulness is quite as great. There is no section of the governmental machinery more important or more accurately and satisfactorily conducted. But the burden put upon Mr. Cortelyou and his coadjutors can be materially lightened without impairing its efficiency. It is our opinion, indeed, that the people and the Government both would be better off if the franking privilege were abolished utterly.

"That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. Congressmen load the postal cars with all sorts of freight—furniture, libraries, kitchen utensils, the family wash, pianos, poultry, barnyard animals, etc., without limit. They frank a cow, a washtub, or a churn as glibly as they do a letter or a speech that no one ever heard. They go further; they lend their franks in large, uncounted bunches to societies and propagandas that would flourish on the public Treasury, as they already thrive upon the people's discontent. The whole system has been converted to the most abominable ends. It presents the perfected spectacle of graft. But its worst expression is to be found in the lumbering up of the mail cars, the preposterous demands upon the Department's resources of transportation, and the corresponding and concurrent crippling of the postal service in all its proper and legitimate activities.

"We note the presentative of an alternative arrangement, an arrangement under the operation of which Members of Congress will receive a direct allowance for the purpose of conducting their official correspondence without cost to themselves. The expedient is most commendable. We quite agree that Members of Congress, who are but ill-paid public servants, should be spared the constant drain upon their resources involved in postage and the like. They should at least be left entirely free of artificial taxes and protected in the complete enjoyment of what small emolument has been assigned them. But this franking concession, which has grown to the proportions of insolent and predaceous graft, this should be contracted within the limits of common decency and transformed into an explicit allowance, no matter how generous and liberal it may be.

"We think there are very few Congressmen who would care to oppose this adjustment in full view of the public gaze. Why not try it, gentlemen?"

Acting under the direction of the resolution, and presuming that the editorial above referred to was the basis for said resolution, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads communicated with the Postmaster-General requesting such information as he might be able to give the committee relative to the subject-matter of the resolution. The correspondence with the Postmaster-General in full is attached hereto and made a part of this report.

The committee also requested the managing editor of the Washington Post to inform the committee of the name of the writer of the editorial, and later had before it for examination Mr. John R. McLean, managing editor of the Washington Post, and Mr. Richard Weightman, an editorial writer on the Post. The examination in full of both of these witnesses is attached hereto and made a part of this report.

In his letter to the committee the Postmaster-General said in reference to the subject-matter of the resolution:

"I have the honor to inform you that there have been from time to time instances in which, as the law was construed by the Department, franks have been improperly used, but so far as known the irregularities have been corrected promptly when attention has been drawn to them. There is no penalty for violation of the franking privilege.

"Franked matter is ordinarily under seal, and therefore is not subject to scrutiny. The recipient of the matter, judging for himself, often alleges abuse when such may not be the fact. No doubt this circumstance accounts in a measure for some of the criticism on the subject."

In the examination of both the managing editor of the Washington Post and Mr. Weightman, who admitted that he wrote the editorial in question, it appeared that neither one of these gentlemen had any information whatever of a single instance wherein any Member of Congress had at any time violated the law relative to the franking privilege. It appears that Mr. Weightman had no idea that the statements which were contained in the editorial were based upon facts, but the editorial was written in a spirit of exaggeration. The managing editor of the paper stated that he directed the publication with that idea only, and with no thought of the statements made being accepted by the reading public as statements of facts.

The committee being unable to ascertain any tangible proof which it might use as a basis for further investigation, and believing that the editorial which prompted the resolution was not founded upon facts, as admitted by its writer and the managing editor of the paper, believes no further investigation under the terms of the House resolution is necessary.

While Mr. Weightman, who wrote the editorial, may have intended it as a semihumorous editorial written in an exaggerated style, and while Mr. McLean, the managing editor of the Post, may not have thought that the editorial would be accepted as a true statement of facts, the reading public, which saw the editorial printed in the Washington Post or as copied in numerous papers throughout the country, appears to have taken the editorial more seriously.

It is unfortunate that greater care is not exercised by public journals in presenting their criticism of public men so as to base such criticism upon fact instead of fancy.

In the editorial in question the charges definitely describe misuse of the mails, specifically enumerating articles transmitted under frank by Members, and that these abuses are so common as to be a matter of "universal knowledge," and indulged in to an extent by Members of Congress that "it presents the perfected spectacle of graft."

In a message from the President of the United States, delivered to Congress under date of March 7, 1906, he says: "Publicity can by itself often accomplish extraordinary results for good, and the courts of public judgment may secure such results where the courts of law are powerless." The editor who wrote the article and the managing editor who gave it his official sanction were before the committee as witnesses and both disclaim knowledge of any facts affording basis of justification for the publishing of the editorial.

The Washington Post has not been regarded as a sensational journal. Published at the seat of Government, it is recognized generally by the press of the country as a mirror fairly reflecting events transpiring in national life more minutely than is possible by papers otherwise located. By common consent its editorial page is acknowledged as exceptionally bright, crisp, and sparkling, and the publication, taken altogether, an up-to-date journal. Its owner and managing editor is not a novice in journalism, but has successfully cultivated this field for many years, and in the domain of journalism, of business, of social and political life, has attained prominence.

Therefore, if "the court of public judgment" to which the President refers is to accomplish results for good "where courts of law are powerless," public judgment must be enlightened judgment, and must be formed upon correct and truthful presentation of facts. A misinformed and misdirected public judgment is responsible for the greatest tragedies marking human history. This article, reflecting upon the general integrity of Congress, has probably been copied in the newspapers of every Congressional district in the Federal Union, and must necessarily tend to a contempt for law; for if the public mind be imbued with the belief that those who make the laws are venal and their action "presents the perfected spectacle of graft," then the honest citizen may well doubt the permanence of free institutions or blessings to flow therefrom when the fountain sources are polluted and the people's interests so shamelessly betrayed by those empowered to stand as their representatives in public life.

There have been epochs in American journalism where the bias of partisan rancor was reflected in editorial utterances, but the editors of the past who have been illustrious in American journalism were conspicuous for their ability in the marshalling of facts, not in the manufacturing of facts.

Your committee believes and admits that all our official actions are proper subjects for criticism by the press, and that it is entitled to illuminate and enlarge upon our mistakes, but we most respectfully submit that the press which stands as the censor of official conduct and affords an opportunity for the formation of an enlightened public judgment to secure "results of good where courts of law are powerless," owe it not alone to the public, but to itself that when a general indictment is drawn, challenging the integrity of Congress, there should be a substantial basis of facts before Congress be arraigned at the bar of public opinion.

It appears by the testimony that after the publication of these charges, and when Congress had ordered the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to make investigation and determine who, if any, of its membership was guilty of these offenses, a subsequent editorial appeared in the Washington Post stating that these charges were not to be taken seriously, but rather in the spirit of pleasantry and exaggerated humor, having for its object the abolishment of the franking privilege. It is known that the original charges have been widely copied, but it does not appear that the subsequent editorial explaining that the charges were to be taken in a humorous sense has been copied by the press. Therefore the injury lies in this, that throughout the country there has been instilled the impression that the franking privilege has been abused and that Congress "presents the perfected spectacle of graft," because one of the foremost journals of the nation, in a spirit of pleasantry, has charged as a fact of "universal knowledge" that these abuses do exist.

The committee requests that it be discharged from further consideration of the subject.

Hon. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: By direction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, I inclose herewith copy of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 4th day of January, 1906, and referred for consideration to this committee, and request that you send to me, for use of the committee, at as early a date as possible, any information which you may have relative to the use of the franking privilege by Members of Congress in violation of law.

Very respectfully,

JESSE OVERSTREET, Chairman.

Hon. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Supplementing my letter of yesterday to you, in reference to House resolution of January 4, 1906, I wish to say further that the committee has no intention at this time of considering the general subject of the franking privilege with reference to changes in existing law or existing practices under the law. We intend to confine the present inquiry directly to the resolution and do not desire any information except such as you may be able to give touching violations of the law by Members of Congress in the use of the franking privilege.

Yours, respectfully,

JESSE OVERSTREET, Chairman.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 22, 1906.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letters of the 9th and 11th ultimo, with the former of which was inclosed a copy of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on January 4, 1906, instructing your committee to investigate "whether or not there are or have been abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress or in the names of Members of Congress," I have the honor to inform you that there have been from time to time instances in which, as the law was construed by the Department, franks have been improperly used, but so far as known the irregularities have been corrected promptly when attention has been drawn to them. There is no penalty for violation of the franking privilege.

Franked matter is ordinarily under seal, and therefore is not subject to scrutiny. The recipient of the matter, judging for himself, often alleges abuse when such may not be the fact. No doubt this circumstance accounts in a measure for some of the criticism on the subject.

While possibly not altogether germane to the resolution, as interpreted in your communications of the above dates, I feel that some attention should be given to the practice of permitting the use of franks by organizations in no way connected with any branch of the Government and that it should be greatly restricted, if not altogether prohibited.

Neither the resolution nor your inquiry calls for any further suggestions on this subject, but I deem it proper to invite attention to the recommendations contained in my annual report, under the head of "Government free matter," which had in view a system of accounting whereby the Post-Office Department should receive credit for work performed for the other Departments and branches of the Government. It is the judgment of this Department that such a system would correct in some degree what may not improperly be regarded as abuses of both the penalty and franking privileges.

Very respectfully,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU, Postmaster-General.

MANAGING EDITOR WASHINGTON POST,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of the House of Representatives, to which committee has been referred for consideration a resolution, copy of which I herewith inclose, to request of you the name of the person who wrote the editorial appearing in a recent issue of your paper, copy of which, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the day of January 4, I also inclose.

The committee desires the name of the writer for the purpose of requesting his appearance before the committee to testify relative to the statements made in that editorial.

Very respectfully,

JESSE OVERSTREET, Chairman.

MANAGING EDITOR, WASHINGTON POST,

SIR: I have had no reply to my letter to you, under date of January 9, asking the name of the person who wrote a certain editorial in your paper.

Will you kindly advise me of the name of this gentleman, in order that I may ask him to appear before the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads to testify under the resolution, a copy of which I sent you in my other communication?

Very respectfully,

JESSE OVERSTREET, Chairman.

Mr. RICHARD WEIGHTMAN,
Washington Post, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Under instructions from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, I request that you appear before that committee at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, February 27, to be heard with respect to the resolution of the House under date of January 4, 1906, a copy of which I herewith inclose.

Very respectfully,

THE WASHINGTON POST,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1906.

Hon. JESSE OVERSTREET, Chairman, etc.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 24th instant, and in reply beg to say that I shall report at the place and time mentioned, if the illness now visiting my family permits. I know nothing personally about abuses of the franking privilege and can say simply that and nothing more when I appear before the committee. It seems to me that I should not be required to leave a sick bed, where I am needed at that particular hour, merely to explain that I have nothing to say. Please believe that I have no desire to disoblige you or to exhibit anything but sincere respect for the committee. The fact is, however, that I am in some distress at home just now, and, naturally, have no burning appetite for comedy.

Very respectfully,

RICHD. WEIGHTMAN.

MARCH 6, 1906.

Mr. JOHN R. MCLEAN,

MY DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads to request your attendance at the room of the committee at the Capitol at 11 a. m., March 7, 1906.

The committee desires to interrogate you with reference to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on January 4, 1906, a copy of which resolution I herewith inclose, the basis for which resolution was an editorial appearing in the Washington Post, a copy of which editorial as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the date of January 4, 1906, I also inclose.

Very respectfully,

JESSE OVERSTREET, Chairman.

Hearing before the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives on the resolution submitted by Mr. SIMS in regard to alleged violations of the franking privilege. Tuesday, March 7, 1906.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, March 6, 1906.

The committee met at 10.50 o'clock a. m., Hon. JESSE OVERSTREET in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish to lay before the committee a resolution, a copy of which you will find at your places, known as the "Sims resolution," which is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to investigate whether or not there are or have been abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress or in the name of Members of Congress."

Mr. Richard Weightman is present, by request, to testify in reference to matters as to which the committee directed me to inquire at the time he attends.

Mr. GRIGGS. I have never seen the editorial. I understand this hearing is based on an editorial in the Post.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly so.

TESTIMONY OF RICHARD L. WEIGHTMAN.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state your name, residence, and occupation?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. My name is Weightman, Richard; occupation, journalist, and my residence, Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. With which journal are you now associated?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The Washington Post.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been associated with it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, with the exception of a slight absence of a few months I have been there fourteen years.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you to examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD dated January 4, which is before you, at page 673, in small type, with the heading "Abolish the franking privilege." Have you read that since entering the room?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that appear in the Washington Post?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you tell the committee who wrote that?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you kindly inform the committee of any facts with reference to the violation of the franking privilege referred to in that editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you any facts upon which to base that editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Not to my personal knowledge; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I understand that the editorial is not based upon facts at all?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes; but not upon my personal experience of it.

The CHAIRMAN. What facts do you mean, then?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. If you will permit me, I will explain it in my own way.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. In the first place, an editorial writer does not go out and get his own facts; if he did he could not write editorials. His facts are brought to him by the managing editor or the proprietor and he is told to write so and so, and he does that; he takes it for granted that the facts are there. At any rate, it is none of his business.

The CHAIRMAN. Were facts given to you by anybody?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. This was really a copy of an article that Mr. Beriah Wilkins told me to write three or four years ago; it is practically the same old story.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you refer to as the same old story?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The general allegations here, which, of course, anyone can see are fantastic and exaggerated and intended to be; and as long as this article was given so much prominence I don't see why the one published the next day was not given the same prominence. That is your affair, though.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, at the time you wrote this particular editorial, or any time immediately preceding it, you had no particular facts laid before you?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; none except that I could write about so and so.

The CHAIRMAN. Who gave you those——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Originally, Mr. Wilkins.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). Who gave you instructions to write this particular editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Nobody. The subject came up and I went on the same facts—the same supposition or theory.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "the subject came up?"

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. There was something said about it in the papers; somebody made a speech about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give this committee any information, direct or indirect, recent or remote, which would enable the committee to find any facts which you allege in this editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, personally I can not, but——

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of anybody with whom you have talked personally whom you believe could give any such information?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Please give us their names.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, Mr. Bennett has been publishing articles in the Post. They are under his own signature.

The CHAIRMAN. About the violation of the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Mr. Bennett?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, he is one of the writers on the Post.

The CHAIRMAN. And what was your purpose in writing that editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Nothing at all except to do my day's work. I had no personal object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it part of your day's work to write that Members of the Congress are violating the law when you have no facts on which to base the allegations?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, well, you can not hold me responsible for what the Post writes.

The CHAIRMAN. Can not we hold you responsible for what you say?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; it is not what I say.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you say this?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I am telling you that I wrote it, but as a matter of fact I can not say what I may be called upon to write for any newspaper unless I own it, and nobody can say in a well-organized newspaper except the owner and the responsible managing editor.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any managing editor tell you to write this particular editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; he doesn't always tell me. He told me years ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The paper has changed ownership since then?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you received any instructions from the present managing editor or the proprietor of this paper to write such an editorial as this?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; not at all. When I am left to my own devices I naturally pursue the same course as has been pursued and advocate the same theories which have been advocated before. I hand in my editorials, and sometimes they are not published; sometimes they are amended.

The CHAIRMAN. You use this expression, after making reference to the abuse of the franking privilege:

"That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge."

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet you state to the committee that you have absolutely no facts upon which to base it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I say I have not personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the statement I have just read is not true. Is this statement true; that this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, I think it is; I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon what do you base your thought that it is true?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Simply because it has been a matter of common talk and newspaper publication for years.

The CHAIRMAN. You think that because it has been a matter of common talk and newspaper publication it is true?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Not all of it; but as I am here in Washington and I——

The CHAIRMAN. What abuses of the franking privilege do you know of, of your own personal knowledge?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I haven't seen any, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any abuse?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. On the strict line of evidence, no; I can not say that I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Then do you say that it was true when you wrote this language:

"That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge?"

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I put that in for the paper to print if they wanted to.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you that question.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. You see I can not assume any responsibility for the publication.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not asking that. I am asking you if the statement which you made is true.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I thought it was true when I wrote it.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet you can not name a single fact?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir. I have a little decision here——

The CHAIRMAN. You say here——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Here is a little decision of the Postmaster-General, just rendered, on one of those things about the Reverend Crafts, who has been using franks of Members of Congress here in large quantities, and here is his decision that it is improper and unlawful. If you had asked me the day before yesterday about it, I would only have told you that I thought so; but here is the Postmaster-General's decision.

The CHAIRMAN. I will read again, Mr. Weightman, from your editorial:

"Congressmen load the cars with all sorts of freight—furniture, libraries, kitchen utensils, the family wash, pianos, poultry, barnyard animals, etc., without limit."

Do you know that of your own personal knowledge?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that statement true?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think so, but I don't know it.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you think so?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Because I have heard it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you believe everything you hear?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Is not that statement false, as a matter of fact?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't think so. It may be exaggerated, as I explained the next day.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you believe that any Member of Congress ever put a piano in the mail?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, I never heard that; no; but, as I told you, that is an extravagant statement.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you if you have ever heard of anybody putting a piano in the mail.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I never heard about a piano, but I have heard about sofas and furniture.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever hear of anybody putting a barnyard animal in the mails?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Not specifically.

The CHAIRMAN. Then is that statement true?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN (reading further from the editorial)—

"They frank a cow, a washtub, or a churn as glibly as they do a letter or the speech that no one ever heard."

Do you know of any Member of Congress that has ever franked a cow?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that statement true?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know whether it was or not; perhaps not.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not false?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there not more falsehood to it than there was truth?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Possibly. I don't know; I can not tell. As I don't know one thing I can not know the other very well. It all comes back to what I told you before, that the man who prints the article—publishes it—is the man to whom you should apply.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you have been connected with the Post, with a slight interval, for fourteen years?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You know in a general way the character of the mails and the articles transmitted through the mails, do you?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever believed that a cow was a mailable article?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I know of its being done in Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. By mail?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not by express?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to say that a cow was ever sent by mail in Wisconsin?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I understood it was franked.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you understand it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I understood——

Mr. GRIGGS. It was not a Congressman, was it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; this was a governor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does a governor have the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know; everybody seems to have it. Mr. Crafts over here has it—this preacher.

The CHAIRMAN. He has not a frank.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. He has evidently been using one.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a different proposition. I am asking you about your information on which you base this editorial.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I have already told you I haven't got any.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any when you wrote this article?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No more than I have told you.

The CHAIRMAN. No more than you have testified there in your answers?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. No information?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I hope you don't think I am concealing anything.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I am asking you if you have any more information than you have given us?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

Mr. SIBLEY. I hope Mr. Weightman does not think he is revealing very much.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I am telling you everything I know.

The CHAIRMAN. I am giving you credit for telling everything you know, but you have not displayed very much information about any facts upon which to base such an editorial.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I was frank about it in the first place.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, you had not any facts of this character when you wrote it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what was your purpose in writing it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I was doing my work on the paper. You don't seem to understand that I am not responsible for what the paper prints, and this was a subject that has been before the country for years. I can find you articles like that printed three or four years ago, when Mr. Wilkins was alive. He came to me and told me to do so and so, and I supposed he knew what he was doing, and he was responsible, and not I. I took this same old subject; I saw some mention that somebody made of it in a speech. Reverend Crafts is getting active again, and I knew about——

Mr. HEDGE. You did not hear about this order you have referred to until yesterday, did you?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes; and wrote about it. I didn't hear about the decision—no—until last Saturday, but the subject had been discussed in the newspapers and in the press generally.

Mr. HEDGE. You didn't have that in mind at the time you wrote this?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

Mr. HEDGE. You didn't refer to it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; not in there. The fact is that the writing of an editorial and the preparation of the news articles are two very different things.

Mr. HEDGE. You say you got your information from Mr. Bennett?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEDGE. Does he bear the same relation to the Post that you do?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. He writes news articles and signs his name. He gives his facts; he is in a very different position from me.

Mr. HEDGE. Was Mr. Bennett connected with the Post at the time this editorial was written?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HEDGE. Had he written any articles on this subject?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. That I don't know. He writes editorial and news articles, both.

Mr. HEDGE. When you say that this privilege has been outrageously abused and is a fact of universal knowledge what do you mean by "universal knowledge?"

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. You see, you are catechising me; you are asking me for definitions of words that I can not give.

Mr. HEDGE. We do not often have an opportunity of catechising so intelligent a witness. You state that this is a matter of universal knowledge?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I should have said, I suppose, that it is the universal belief and gossip.

Mr. HEDGE. You wish to correct that?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I can not correct it in the Post, but they do it frequently; it hurts my feelings, but they do it.

Mr. HEDGE. I am referring to the statement here. You are responsible for your statements made here.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEDGE. You made the statement that this was a matter of universal knowledge.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; I said I should have said belief; that is what I say personally; I disclaim any responsibility.

Mr. HEDGE. You do not admit that there is any universal knowledge that you have not a share in, do you?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HEDGE. Universal knowledge?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, a great deal.

Mr. GRIGGS. As I understand this examination, it is for the purpose of arriving at the names of any persons who may have been guilty of this charge in this editorial. Now, then, can you give to the committee the names of any persons who claim to know things charged in this editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Well, Mr. Wilkins is dead, and the managing editor has gone to Chicago; he is the man that received the facts and gave us the subjects to write about; he is not here or I would refer you to him.

Mr. GRIGGS. You mean Mr. Bone, I suppose?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; Mr. Scott Bone.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Bone was not managing editor at the time you wrote this editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; but when I wrote the other, previously, Mr. Bone was managing editor. Mr. Bone has left the paper now.

Mr. GRIGGS. You insist, of course, that you are not responsible for anything the Post says——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Of course not.

Mr. GRIGGS. We understand that very well, but you understand that you are here in your personal capacity, do you not?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIGGS. Now, then, as to these charges in that editorial which are directly made against Members of Congress by name——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Not names.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes; Members of Congress.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, that way.

Mr. GRIGGS. I possibly should say by title. You do not know of any person except Mr. Beriah Wilkins and Mr. Bone—I simply want to get at facts, that is all——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I understand, but you confuse the situation, I think. I am here as a witness in my personal capacity, but I did not write that editorial in my personal capacity.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand that; but you must have had some knowledge in your personal capacity?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I had what I thought was knowledge, but it was not universal.

Mr. GRIGGS. Now, then, give us the basis of that knowledge.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, well, in a newspaper office, Mr. Griggs, unless I give you the whole story of the construction of a newspaper office I don't suppose I would make myself plain at all. We have three sets of people in there; one are the men who go out and get the facts, as they suppose, innocently suppose; the others are those employed to comment on them, and the other class are those who tell how to comment on the facts, those who dictate the policy of the paper. The individual writer hasn't anything to do with it. Sometimes he writes things he doesn't believe in.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand, but the question before you and before the committee is whether you believe him——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN (interrupting). Oh, no, no; I think that was an extravagance and so wrote the next day. Mr. McLean came to me. I think I get $25 a week extra for embroidery.

Mr. GRIGGS. I think I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. You regarded this as embroidery, I understand?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It was embroidery of what I believed to be facts. It was put in a grotesque way and, I thought, an extravagant way, and when it was taken seriously here I wrote another article.

Mr. GRIGGS. Then you can not give us facts to reach any persons that are guilty?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

Mr. SIMS. Inasmuch as I am the man who took seriously the statements which you say now are neither true nor serious, I would like to ask you a few questions.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. This editorial is headed, "Abolish the franking privilege," is it not?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. Did you write that?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. Your object in writing this article, then, was to secure the demand that you made, and that is to have the franking privilege abolished?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Not at all.

Mr. SIMS. Is not that the purport of the article from one end to the other—to abolish the franking privilege and have a money allowance made in lieu of it—because, on your allegation, Members of Congress abuse the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I deny that as my allegation at all; that is the Post.

Mr. SIMS. I say is not that the object of the article—to furnish an argument, based upon alleged facts, for the abolition of the franking privilege—is not that the object?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I fancy that is one of the objects.

Mr. SIMS. You say you "fancy." You certainly ought to be able to state what the object was, if the object is not expressed on the face of it.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It seems to me I have made it clear that I have no object in anything I write except to please my employer and carry out his policy.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to ask you if you as an editorial writer will write an article that you neither believe in nor indorse, simply because you are a salaried employee, an article touching the character of officials, high or low?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Is that in the form of an interrogatory?

Mr. SIMS. That is what it is.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I must say again, for about the tenth time, that I do not do these things in my personal capacity, and I am not going to be held responsible for them.

Mr. SIMS. But I ask you as an editorial writer, do you write an editorial alleging existence of facts which you yourself do not believe, simply because you are paid a salary.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I do not think I will allege anything seriously that I don't believe.

Mr. GRIGGS. I don't understand you.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I say I do not think I would allege anything seriously that I do not believe or that I violently disbelieve.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to ask you who gave you orders or directions, or whatever is your way of expressing it, to write upon this subject and to write this article?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Nobody.

Mr. SIMS. Was this article passed on by the managing editor, the responsible person in the Post, before it was printed?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Why, certainly. Nothing can go into the Post——

Mr. SIMS. Who is the responsible managing editor of the Post, or responsible head?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Mr. McLean is the responsible managing editor of the Post.

Mr. SIMS. Did he pass on this?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know whether he did or not; it was published by his authority.

Mr. SIMS. And you declare you have no responsibility whatever——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No personal responsibility.

Mr. SIMS. When you stated here—I want to quote the exact language, and therefore I will look for it—after stating these facts with reference to Members of Congress, this article says:

"It presents the perfected spectacle of graft."

Now, is not that a charge which is very serious and affecting the character and usefulness of any Member of Congress who may be guilty?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; I should think it would if he was guilty.

Mr. SIMS. Would you make a charge of that kind simply by direction or orders of the managing editor?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Why, certainly; of course I would; or else resign.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand by that that if the managing editor were to instruct you to write an article like that and you had no knowledge of the facts that you simply use your knowledge of his knowledge of the facts or your belief in his knowledge of the facts?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. And you would furnish the embroidery?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The embroidery.

Mr. SIBLEY. Right in that connection, were you ever instructed to give a sort of "roast" to the Congressmen on the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. What is that?

Mr. SIBLEY. Were you ever instructed to give a "roast" to the Congressmen on the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, yes; originally. I had never heard of it until it first came out some years ago, just before Mr. Wilkins got so ill. He started that——

Mr. SIBLEY. But since Mr. Wilkins's death?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I didn't get any specific instructions about that thing; no.

Mr. SIBLEY. On that very line, I believe you stated that you wrote this identical article at the request of Mr. Beriah Wilkins——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Oh, no——

Mr. SIMS. Well, upon the orders of Mr. Wilkins?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I said practically the same article; I didn't say specifically the same article; I didn't say that was a copy, but the same tone.

Mr. SIMS. About six years ago?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. And why was it not published?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It was.

Mr. SIMS. It was published in the Post?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; some things like that have been published in the Post for the last four or five years.

Mr. SIMS. Can you bring that article and incorporate it as part of your statement?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't think I can undertake to ransack the files of the Post. I have been trying to explain, and I think my statement ought to be taken——

Mr. SIMS. Your explanation was, as I understood it, that you first wrote this character of an article——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Many of them——

Mr. SIMS. About six years ago, upon direction of Mr. Beriah Wilkins, who was then the managing editor of the Washington Post?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; his suggestion——

Mr. SIMS. Then you say you wrote this, being substantially the same, and put it in the Post without any direction from anyone?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Then you are responsible for writing this particular article and putting it in the Post upon your own statement, without any direction from anyone?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't think so; I handed it in to the managing editor, and it was passed on there.

Mr. SIMS. No one suggested it, though?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; not there——

Mr. SIMS. Then you wrote this on your own suggestion?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Moved by your own reason for writing it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Moved by carrying on the policy of the paper. The same things have been in there before——

Mr. SIMS. Is it the policy of the Post to make statements alleging them to be facts, which are false and believed to be false, as the basis of an editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. As I do not conduct the Post, and am not responsible for what appears in it, I do not think I can answer that.

Mr. SIMS. I am only asking you as to the facts, as you have referred to the policy of the Post.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I knew about the policy because I had written on it before.

Mr. SIMS. Was the policy of the Post, with reference to the franking privilege of Members of Congress, to write editorials upon allegations which were not true and known not to be true at the time?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know whether they were true or not.

Mr. SIMS. My object in introducing this resolution was to get at the fact. If any Members of Congress are guilty of abuses of the franking privilege, I think we ought to know it; and if anybody has been guilty of outrageously abusing the franking privilege I think that Member ought to be expelled. You say that this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. And yet you say you wrote this article without suggestion and without any knowledge of facts and up to this time have no knowledge of any of these allegations which you have stated? That is all I wish to ask you.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would like to ask Mr. Weightman this: By anyone has there ever been given you the name of any Congressman, or Representative, who has been guilty of abusing the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I can not remember, but there was a story—they had a nickname of him, "Boots." Somebody here had a nickname here of "Boots," because in a mail package which went under a frank and which was broken, a pair of boots came out.

Mr. SIBLEY. Was that in recent years?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

Mr. SIBLEY. A great many years ago. I think it was way back before the present franking privilege was granted. I remember something about that. Do you know of any other case within recent time?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; I do not.

Mr. SIBLEY. I wondered if this present agitation of the franking privilege grew out of the transmission through the mails of articles by the Reverend Doctor Crafts.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It was apropos of that. I had that in mind when I wrote this article, but I didn't mention him, I think. But, as I have told you, I took all this back, so far as the serious statement is concerned, the next day.

Mr. SIBLEY. The trouble is——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; I know——

Mr. SIBLEY (continuing). That other papers have published it, because the Post presents things very spicily. You recognize that editorial has been copied very generally throughout the press of the country——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The Post is copied, yes.

Mr. SIBLEY (continuing). As tending to show the demoralization existing among Members of Congress. You wrote this evidently in a semi-humorous vein?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think that is obvious.

Mr. SIBLEY. And then you made a denial—that is, in another editorial—saying that it was not altogether true; but the general public, who are interested in this, have not seen the denial.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It has the same prominence that this had; the only trouble is that you gave this prominence and did not give the other prominence. If you had, it would not have attracted so much attention.

Mr. SIBLEY. One thing more. I want to get this clear. So far as your personal knowledge extends, and so far as anybody has ever told you of any specific violation of the franking privilege by any Member of Congress is concerned, the statements are incorrect, are they not?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. For all I know they may be absolutely incorrect.

Mr. SIBLEY. They may be absolutely incorrect?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; but for all I know they may be correct.

Mr. SIBLEY. So far as you know, they may be false?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. So far as I know, they may be absolutely false, absolutely.

Mr. SIBLEY. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a question or two.

Mr. John R. McLean is now managing editor of the Post?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And he was the managing editor at the time of this editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Mr. McLean direct you to write this editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether or not it was ever called to his attention personally——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Before, no.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). Before it was printed?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I say before it was printed?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Personally by you?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; but his local representatives must have seen it, because editorials are not put in any well-regulated paper without attention.

The CHAIRMAN. What I want to know is, did you personally confer with Mr. McLean before this was printed?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you confer with anyone?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No, sir.

Mr. STEENERSON. What did you do with your editorial after you wrote it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. There is a little wire basket that I put it in.
Mr. STEENERSON. Describe the process.
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Everybody who writes editorials—I have worked on a lot of papers, in New Orleans and other cities—hands them to the representative of the manager, or the managing editor, or whatever he may be called; sometimes he is called the managing editor and sometimes the editor in chief, but he gives them to the head of the paper, whoever he may be, because there is always a head on the paper, for the reason that the paper can not have a policy unless somebody guides. As a writer I do not guide it, and have nothing to do with it; I put what I write in a little basket and that goes to the managing editor——
Mr. STEENERSON. Who is managing editor?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Mr. McLean is managing editor.
Mr. STEENERSON. So you suppose Mr. McLean did read it before it was printed?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I suppose he did.
The CHAIRMAN. Has any comment been made since this editorial was printed, as to whether or not it was regarded by the management of the paper as serious or comic or otherwise?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. As I told you, the next day, or two days afterwards—I don't recollect, but within a day or two—Mr. McLean spoke to me about it, and he said it was very much to his surprise. He said he was afraid it had given offense, so better write another article explaining that it was intended for an extravagance and not for an explicit or organized statement of the facts, which I did; but unfortunately that did not seem to attract as much attention as this.
The CHAIRMAN. Then the second article you wrote, to which you refer, explaining that the first article was an exaggeration, you were directed to write by Mr. McLean?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. He spoke to me about it; yes.
Mr. SIMS. Right there let me ask you this: This second article you refer to was not written until after the House had passed this resolution?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think not.
Mr. SIMS. The article quoted had been written during the recess—in the recess before the time this resolution was introduced?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know.
Mr. SIMS. Newspapers had copied this article all over the country before this resolution was introduced, had they not? And had you not seen them?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The exchanges don't pass through my hands—except a few southern papers that I look at.
Mr. SIMS. Then I suppose the impression you leave is that if Congress had not taken notice of this there would not have been any editorial coming out and explaining that the statements herein made were not true and were exaggerations?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I can not speak for myself, but I fancy that is the reason.
Mr. SIMS. In other words, this would have gone along and been published all over the United States that Members of Congress were violating the franking privilege if Congress had not passed this resolution so far as your paper is concerned?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions to be asked of Mr. Weightman?
Mr. FINLEY. I want to ask you, are you aware that the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, in his report, recommends the abolition of the franking and penalty privileges?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; I am not.
Mr. FINLEY. That is, for Members of Congress and the Departments, on page 21 of his report?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. When did that come out—before this editorial?
Mr. FINLEY. Yes.
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Probably that is what I wrote about. I write so much—I write so many things——
Mr. GRIGGS. That was published before Congress met.
Mr. FINLEY. This is the report of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General for the year ended June 30, 1905. He says:
"The franking and penalty privileges are, by reason of their nature, subject to abuses, a precise and accurate description of which is not possible at the present time; but in view of experience already had I feel impelled to say that the interests of the Government and of this Department would be best subserved if those two privileges were abolished altogether."
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I suppose somebody must have put that on my desk and that is what started me. I don't know; I can not——
Mr. FINLEY. I observe that the Third Assistant, in his report to Congress, suggests to Congress whether or not it is advisable to abolish the franking privilege, as I have just read.
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think it is very likely that that would inspire me to write this article. I can not remember. I had no idea of giving offense.
Mr. FINLEY. The Third Assistant says, further:
"I have the honor to suggest the consideration of the question of whether or not it is advisable to recommend to Congress the abolition of the franking and penalty privileges, or, at least, the latter, and the substitution therefor of a system of appropriations to supply the needs of Members of Congress and the various Departments for postage expenses in the transaction of their official business."
I ask you this question, because the matter was brought up here in the hearings, and General Madden was examined along that line.
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. That is probably what inspired this—started me out.
Mr. SNAPP. I don't think that report was out when this editorial was written.
Mr. FINLEY. Yes; this is the report for last year.
The CHAIRMAN. At all events there is nothing in this report or in any of the reports to the Post-Office Department which would indicate that Members of Congress have been abusing the privilege.
Mr. FINLEY. No.
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It refers there to the ease with which it can be abused. It does not say it has been done.
The CHAIRMAN. You know of no foundation in any report of the Post-Office Department of any abuse or suggestion of an abuse by Members of Congress of the franking privilege, do you?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; I don't know of any. This is the first thing I have seen officially—the first thing.
Mr. SNAPP. That report could not have been out then—November 18?
Mr. FINLEY. Yes; it was out, because I received a copy.
Mr. GRIGGS. It was dated November 18.
Mr. FINLEY. They were sent before Congress convened.
Mr. GRIGGS. The report was dated November 18.
The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions by members of the committee?
Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I only say it is quite likely that somebody may have cut that out and put it on my desk. I constantly find things there for me to write about—memoranda or suggestions.
The CHAIRMAN. We will excuse you, Mr. Weightman, and we will excuse the reporter.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1906.

The committee met this day at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. JESSE OVERSTREET in the chair.

STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN R. M'LEAN.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe, Mr. McLean, you are the managing editor of the Washington Post?
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you to examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 4 last, at page 673, which I hand you [submitting copy of RECORD], and the printing in small type particularly, which purports to be an editorial in your paper.
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You were managing editor of the Post at the time of that publication?
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you see that editorial before it was printed?
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. It came to you in the ordinary process of your organization?
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. And you passed upon it before printing?
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Will you be kind enough to explain to the committee if you are familiar with the facts as appear to have been stated in that editorial?
Mr. MCLEAN. I know nothing of the facts.
The CHAIRMAN. When you passed upon the item for printing did you pass it with the belief that those statements were facts?
Mr. MCLEAN. No. I passed it as I would pass any general article, thinking that it meant more to be—it seemed to me an aggravated case of editorial. It was not meant to come right down to facts and to say, "These are facts," but it was a thing that had been told and talked about a little bit and commented upon by the newspapers. But as to being facts, or that the Post meant it to be that, or intended it to be accepted as that, there was nothing of it.
The CHAIRMAN. Then you merely intended to pass upon something that was current—something that——
Mr. MCLEAN. Yes; there was no intent to injure at all.
Mr. HEDGE. Was it intended to affect public opinion, Mr. McLean?
Mr. MCLEAN. No, sir. Sometimes we print an article to fill up with. [Laughter.] As I say, there was no intent to injure or damage anyone. It was a general article, and frequently you work up things, and one of the editors is asked to comment on it or criticise it or pass upon it, and sometimes things are accepted and you don't know the writer. He may be in your office, but you may not know him.
Mr. SNAPP. Did it not occur to you that such an article might reflect on Members of Congress and injure them with their constituents?
Mr. MCLEAN. No; this was meant to be general. It was not meant to reflect on any individual.
Mr. SNAPP. Does it not occur to you that exaggerated and untruthful statements of that kind against Members of Congress do hurt them in the public mind?
Mr. MCLEAN. No; it was not meant to be that. I thought the general reader would accept that as a general article. There was no individual in mind, and no particular case cited. It was only a general article.
Mr. SNAPP. How can you expect that the general reader shall discriminate as to the truth or falsity of statements of that kind when you don't do it?
Mr. MCLEAN. Probably I have a wrong impression, but I do not know——
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of your own knowledge of any instances of the violation or abuse of the franking privilege by any Member of Congress?
Mr. MCLEAN. Not one.
The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions, gentlemen? I think, then, Mr. McLean, that is all.

---

The following is the passage in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD referred to above:

"ABOLISH THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE?

"We quite agree that something ought to be done for the relief of the Post-Office Department. Its work is simply tremendous, and, by an interesting coincidence, its usefulness is quite as great. There is no section of the governmental machinery more important or more accurately and satisfactorily conducted. But the burden put upon Mr. Cortelyou and his coadjutors can be materially lightened without impairing its efficiency. It is our opinion, indeed, that the people and the Government both would be better off if the franking privilege were abolished utterly.

"That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. Congressmen load the postal cars with all sorts of freight—furniture, libraries, kitchen utensils, the family wash, pianos, poultry, barnyard animals, etc., without limit. They frank a cow, a washtub, or a churn as glibly as they do a letter or the speech that no one ever heard. They go further—they lend their franks in large, uncounted bunches to societies and propagandas that would flourish on the public Treasury as they already thrive upon the people's discontent. The whole system has been converted to the most abominable ends. It presents the perfected spectacle of graft. But its worst expression is to be found in the lumbering up of the mail cars, the preposterous demands upon the Department's resources of transportation, and the corresponding and concurrent crippling of the postal service in all its proper and legitimate activities.

"We note the presentation of an alternative arrangement—an arrangement under the operation of which Members of Congress will receive a direct allowance for the purpose of conducting their official correspondence without cost to themselves. The expedient is most commendable. We quite agree that Members of Congress, who are but ill-paid public servants, should be spared the constant drain upon their resources involved in postage and the like. They should at least be left entirely free of artificial taxes and protected in the complete enjoyment of what small emolument has been assigned them. But this franking concession, which has grown to the proportions of insolent and predaceous graft, this should be contracted within the limits of common decency and transformed into an explicit allowance, no matter how generous and liberal it may be.

"We think there are very few Congressmen who would care to oppose this adjustment in full view of the public gaze. Why not try it, gentlemen?"

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to submit the original editorial which was the basis of these proceedings.

The editorial is as follows:

ABOLISH THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE?

We quite agree that something ought to be done for the relief of the Post-Office Department. Its work is simply tremendous, and, by an interesting coincidence, its usefulness is quite as great. There is no section of the governmental machinery more important or more accurately and satisfactorily conducted. But the burden put upon Mr. Cortelyou and his coadjutors can be materially lightened without impairing its efficiency. It is our opinion, indeed, that the people and the Government both would be better off if the franking privilege were abolished utterly.

That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. Congressmen load the postal cars with all sorts of freight—furniture, libraries, kitchen utensils, the family wash, pianos, poultry, barnyard animals, etc., without limit. They frank a cow, a washtub, or a churn as glibly as they do a letter or the speech that no one ever heard. They go further—they lend their franks in large, uncounted bunches to societies and propagandas that would flourish on the public Treasury as they already thrive upon the people's discontent. The whole system has been converted to the most abominable ends. It presents the perfected spectacle of graft. But its worst expression is to be found in the lumbering up of the mail cars, the preposterous demands upon the Department's resources of transportation, and the corresponding and concurrent crippling of the postal service in all its proper and legitimate activities.

We note the presentation of an alternative arrangement—an arrangement under the operation of which Members of Congress will receive a direct allowance for the purpose of conducting their official correspondence without cost to themselves. The expedient is most commendable. We quite agree that Members of Congress, who are but ill-paid public servants, should be spared the constant drain upon their resources involved in postage and the like. They should at least be left entirely free of artificial taxes and protected in the complete enjoyment of what small emolument has been assigned them. But this franking concession, which has grown to the proportions of insolent and predaceous graft, this should be contracted within the limits of common decency and transformed into an explicit allowance, no matter how generous and liberal it may be.

We think there are very few Congressmen who would care to oppose this adjustment in full view of the public gaze. Why not try it, gentlemen?

Mr. SIMS. I desire also to submit certain extracts from the testimony of Mr. Weightman and Mr. McLean.

The extracts are as follows:

Mr. SIMS. Inasmuch as I am the man who took seriously the statements which you say now are neither true nor serious, I would like to ask you a few questions.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. This editorial is headed "Abolish the franking privilege," is it not?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. Did you write that?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. Your object in writing this article, then, was to secure the demand that you made, and that is to have the franking privilege abolished?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Not at all.

Mr. SIMS. Is not that the purport of the article from one end to the other, to abolish the franking privilege and have a money allowance made in lieu of it, because on your allegation Members of Congress abuse the franking privilege?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I deny that as my allegation at all; that is the Post.

Mr. SIMS. I say is not that the object of the article, to furnish an argument, based upon alleged facts, for the abolition of the franking privilege—is not that the object?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I fancy that is one of the objects.

Mr. SIMS. You say fancy. You certainly ought to be able to state what the object was if the object is not expressed on the face of it.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. It seems to me I have made it clear that I have no object in anything I write, except to please my employer and carry out his policy.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to ask you if you, as an editorial writer, will write an article that you neither believe in nor indorse, simply because you are a salaried employee, an article touching the character of officials, high or low?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Is that in the form of an interrogatory?

Mr. SIMS. That is what it is.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I must say again, for about the tenth time, that I do not do these things in my personal capacity, and I am not going to be held responsible for them.

Mr. SIMS. But I ask you as an editorial writer, do you write editorials alleging existence of facts which you yourself do not believe simply because you are paid a salary?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I do not think I will allege anything seriously that I do not believe.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to ask you who gave you orders or directions, or whatever is your way of expressing it, to write upon this subject and to write this article?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Nobody.

Mr. SIMS. Was this article passed on by the managing editor, the responsible person in the Post, before it was printed?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Why, certainly. Nothing can go into the Post——

Mr. SIMS. Who is the responsible managing editor of the Post, or responsible head?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Mr. McLean is the responsible managing editor of the Post.

Mr. SIMS. Did he pass on this?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know whether he did or not; it was published by his authority.

Mr. SIMS. And you declare you have no responsibility whatever?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No personal responsibility.

Mr. SIMS. When you stated here—I want to quote the exact language, and therefore I will look for it—after stating these facts, with reference to Members of Congress, this article says:

"It presents the perfected spectacle of graft."

Now, is not that a charge which is very serious and affecting the character and usefulness of any Member of Congress who may be guilty?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; I should think it would if he was guilty.

Mr. SIMS. Would you make a charge of that kind simply by direction or orders of the managing editor?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Why, certainly; of course I would; or else resign.

Mr. SIMS. Your explanation was, as I understood it, that you first wrote this character of an article——

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Many of them——

Mr. SIMS. About six years ago, upon direction of Mr. Beriah Wilkins, who was then the managing editor of the Washington Post?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes; his suggestion——

Mr. SIMS. Then you say you wrote this, being substantially the same, and put it in the Post without any direction from anyone?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Then you are responsible for writing this particular article and putting it in the Post upon your own statement, without any direction from anyone?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't think so; I handed it in to the managing editor, and it was passed on there.

Mr. SIMS. No one suggested it, though?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; not there——

Mr. SIMS. Then you wrote this on your own suggestion?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Moved by your own reason for writing it?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Moved by carrying out the policy of the paper; the same things have been in there before——

Mr. SIMS. Is it the policy of the Post to make statements, alleging them to be facts, which are false and believed to be false, as the basis of an editorial?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. As I do not conduct the Post and am not responsible for what appears in it, I do not think I can answer that.

Mr. SIMS. I am only asking you as to the facts, as you have referred to the policy of the Post.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I knew about the policy because I had written on it before.

Mr. SIMS. Was the policy of the Post with reference to the franking privilege of Members of Congress to write editorials upon allegations which were not true and known not to be true at the time?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know whether they were true or not.

Mr. SIMS. My object in introducing this resolution was to get at the fact; if any Members of Congress are guilty of abuses of the franking privilege I think we ought to know it, and if anybody has been guilty of outrageously abusing the franking privilege, I think that Member ought to be expelled. You say that this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. And yet you say you wrote this article without suggestion and without knowledge of facts, and up to this time have no knowledge of any of these allegations which you have stated. That is all I wish to ask you.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SIMS. Right there, let me ask you this: This second article you refer to was not written until after the House had passed this resolution?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I think not.

Mr. SIMS. The article quoted had been written during the recess—in the recess before the time this resolution was introduced?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I don't know.

Mr. SIMS. Newspapers had copied this article all over the country before this resolution was introduced; had they not? And had you not seen them?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The exchanges do not pass through my hands—except a few southern papers that I look at.

Mr. SIMS. Then I suppose the impression you leave is that if Congress had not taken notice of this there would not have been any editorial coming out and explaining that the statements herein made were not true, and were exaggerations?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I can not speak for myself, but I fancy that is the reason.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, this would have gone along and been published all over the United States, that Members of Congress were violating the franking privilege, if Congress had not passed this resolution, so far as your paper is concerned?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Yes.

Mr. MCLEAN. I know nothing of the facts.

Mr. SNAPP. Did it not occur to you that such an article might reflect on Members of Congress and injure them with their constituents?

Mr. MCLEAN. No; this was meant to be general. It was not meant to reflect on any individual.

Mr. SNAPP. Does it not occur to you that exaggerated and untruthful statements of that kind against Members of Congress do hurt them in the public mind?

Mr. MCLEAN. No; it was not meant to be that. I thought the general reader would accept it as a general article. There was no individual in mind and no particular cases cited. It was only a general article.

Mr. SNAPP. How can you expect that the general reader shall discriminate as to the truth or falsity of statements of that kind when you don't do it?

Mr. MCLEAN. Probably I have a wrong impression, but I do not know——

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of your own knowledge of any instances of the violation or abuse of the franking privilege by Members of Congress?

Mr. MCLEAN. Not one.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, as the author of the resolution I have naturally felt an interest in the investigation and report of the committee. The committee seem to have acted fairly and conscientiously, and have made as full a report as the evidence warranted. The excuse or explanation for the making of these charges, made by this responsible newspaper, after this resolution was introduced and acted upon, as appears from the report of the committee, was that the charges were not serious nor intended to be taken as serious; and reference is made to a second editorial on the same subject in the same paper, which has not been copied by the committee in its report; but as the evidence will show, Mr. Weightman, the editor who wrote the article, seems rather to complain that the editorial was taken seriously, saying that the second article would, as he claims, remove the impression of evil intent in the first article if it had been given the same publicity. Now, I propose to read and comment on that editorial article as I read and commented on the first, so that if there was any injustice done him he may rectify it. This is the second editorial:

AS REGARDS THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

We haven't the slightest doubt that the Hon. T. W. SIMS, of Tennessee, is perfectly sincere in calling for a Congressional investigation of the use or misuse that has been made of the franking privilege. Incidentally we wish to acknowledge with appropriate sentiments his very complimentary references to the Post. It occurs to us, however, to suggest that it is rather late in the day to take a solemn view of this or any other matter which has been the subject of gossip and of jest for many years. And we venture this intimation with all the more confidence because we happen to know that the records of the Post-Office Department contain, or ought to contain, large floods of detailed information for the benefit of anyone who thinks it worth while to investigate an ancient and notorious graft.

To say that we were serious in publishing the article which has stimulated Mr. SIMS to stern inquiry would be to exaggerate the situation. Of course we were not serious. Why should we be? The matter has been one of ribald comment for years. Everybody has heard of it, everybody has discussed it, nobody has denied it. Moreover, it is known of all men who keep themselves informed of public affairs that the question is one of official record—supposing the records have been scrupulously kept—and certainly of common knowledge in the Department. As we have already suggested, the only way to attack the scandal is to abolish the franking privilege altogether and to substitute a reasonable annual allowance for postage—a very liberal one, in fact—so that Members of Congress may not be called upon to deplete their meager salaries by paying postage upon mail matter for which they are not properly responsible. What the country wants in this case is not an inquisition into conditions that are as notorious as the process of the seasons, but a law that will put an end to them forever.

We would not have Mr. SIMS imagine for a moment that we object to the searchlight as such. Our object is merely to indicate the inevitable waste of time involved in that method, and point out the practical advantages of the alternative expedient we have outlined. Investigate by all means, if there be any real doubt in Congress as to the facts. Somewhere in the Post-Office Department the material for a finished chronicle is awaiting its discoverer and historian. But if the statesmen on the Hill want to stop a leak rather than amuse the public with a spectacle, they will let the past alone and make laws for the future.

So this is what, upon mature reflection, after this Congress acted upon that resolution and sent it to the committee, is given as the wiping out, the blotting out, of all criminal charge that there was in the first editorial, by simply reiterating that it was all true and that the records of the Post-Office Department would disclose and prove the facts. [Laughter.] Now, that is a strange way—to say that I charge you with being a thief and then state that it is not serious, but cite the record of conviction to prove it. I think the gentleman ought to have the benefit of his explanation of his way of not being serious in charging criminal conduct upon Members of Congress as set forth in a subsequent editorial.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it true, as stated in the papers frequently, that some Departments have been guilty of franking furniture, safes, and desks, and other things of that kind through the mail?

Mr. SIMS. It has been charged in the papers that the Departments have been guilty of shipping freight under frank which would be cheaper to ship by express or simple freight.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that a mistake has been made, that instead of charging the committee or Members of Congress they should have charged the Departments with violating the law?

Mr. SIMS. The whole article is a charge against Members of Congress; there is nothing in it about the Departments. Now, I want to give you the benefit of the answers by one of these gentlemen. He claims, as appears from his testimony, that he wrote a similar editorial six years ago, when the Washington Post was under the charge of the Hon. Beriah Wilkins, formerly an honored Member of this House; that it was in accordance with the policy of the Post.

I do not want to do injustice to the Post or the editorial writers, but that article read on the 5th here and reread to-day has nothing on the face of it to suggest that it was not serious and intended to be true. If I was misled by not being a competent judge of such a thing, all the leading newspapers of the United States were similarly misled, for they quoted and commented upon it and reiterated it as true. Now, I want to explain to you, in the language of the managing editor, not undertaking to quote him, what he says about his responsibility.

Mr. Weightman denies all responsibility and says he wrote as he was directed, but rather gets away from it when the question comes directly to him.

I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman, if he was going to state a fact and wanted it to be accepted as a fact, what language he would undertake to use that is more specific and definite than the language used in the editorial that was quoted at the beginning of this report. But it seems that a great newspaper that appears to have a well-earned character for conservatism, certainly a great paper so far as ability of editorial writers in the treatment of large questions is concerned, will publish lightly and flippantly an article charging offenses that would disgrace any Member of this House if proven on him and then excuse the gravity of this charge simply by saying that it was general; that he called no names and pointed out no individual. I suppose he thinks that if he calls all Members of the House grafters and thieves it does not hurt, but to call a few individual Members of the House by name and to characterize them as guilty of such charges would be injurious. What would you say to a statement from a responsible newspaper that all the women in Washington are bad, but in explanation should say that they didn't mean it because they included them all? When charges are made that are general and sweeping and which apply to every Member of the House, they are certainly in results more grave and serious than to say that a particular individual is guilty, or a few individuals are guilty, and point them out, because then we could investigate and find out the truth.

I can not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished managing editor of this paper ever really read the article; that he really did not know what was in it. I do not believe that he is capable of wanting to cast upon this House that degree of contempt and disgrace that this article does on the flimsy foundation of mere rumors or mere gossip that had been floating around the Capitol, as said by his editorial writer, for many years.

I desire to call attention to an article in the Washington Post of yesterday which I highly commend. It is an article advocating self-government for the District of Columbia, to enfranchise the enslaved and enlightened freemen of this District. I believe that article is one that every Member of this House will approve, but is it not strange that a great paper should publish such an article when it flippantly publishes statements that if believed, as they were believed, would cause the people to lose confidence in the agencies of self-government? Why, Mr. Speaker, I know that the constituents of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] would not believe that he was guilty, but I also know that the constituents of some gentleman from California might believe that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was guilty. But what shall we say of this when it comes at a time when agitation seems to be the rule, when it seems that the foundations of civil government are almost shaken by the threat of socialism? That an attack, serious or otherwise, should be made upon the integrity of the officials of this Government is something to me too serious to be cast aside with the mere brush of the hand. I do think that the great newspapers, which under the law of this country enjoy the franking privilege to the extent of nearly $27,000,000 a year, ought to be a little careful when they accuse Members of Congress of abusing the franking privilege to such an extent as to constitute a moral and legal crime.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] to grant me, say, five minutes more.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make a charge unexplained. It is known to everybody in this House, but perhaps not by the whole people, that newspapers are entitled to the second-class mail privileges, and that second-class mail privileges such as those newspapers enjoy cost the Government upon the lowest estimate six times as much as it gets out of it, and when it costs the Government, as I believe it did if I am not incorrect, $33,000,000 last year to carry second-class mail matter, and for which the Government received only $6,000,000, it may be said that the courtesies of the franking privilege given to the press of the country exceeds by millions of dollars anything that could possibly be the result of its most liberal and unjust use by Members of Congress.

That is all right, Mr. Speaker. We are making no complaint, but this article seriously demands the abolition of the franking privilege for Members of Congress. Maybe the writer of that article is correct, but suppose we go into the abolition of the franking privilege and abolish that right to the press of the country, would not there be a very large saving to the Treasury of the United States and to the taxpayer? I do not advocate such a thing as this, but before I want to strike down the franking privileges of the Members of Congress I desire to think a little of the enjoyment of that privilege by the newspapers of the country. Twelve and a half per cent is paid upon the actual cost of second-class mail matter. What are the great newspapers of the country? They are business institutions whose editors, some of them, draw princely salaries. Perhaps they are worth it, but when a great newspaper is going through the mails with ten pages of reading matter and thirty pages of advertising—going through the mails at about one-eighth of what the actual cost to the Government is—I think it is time to speak about it. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a charge of this kind, when seriously noticed by a Member of this House, should not be used in an effort to try and belittle and ruin him.

It is a little too grave. Official character is beyond value, or should be. If the people lose confidence in the integrity of the instruments of self-government selected by themselves, what then is to be done? Revolution and anarchy may follow, and there is no better way to bring this country into such a condition than to publish false, villainous, and slanderous statements and libelous charges against the officials of the Government, and especially those who are selected every two years as Members of the legislative branch of the Government. A mere whisper touching the character of a woman is often enough to damn her for life, and next to her precious character that of the official is most easily injured and damaged, and it is irreparable. The article which was published all over the United States, read and believed by thousands, many more thousands than disbelieved it, as shown by the fact the press everywhere accepted it as true, will not be followed in the same papers by the publication of this report. The injury done by such charges, lightly or seriously or otherwise made, is such as to become irreparable. Never can we fully wipe it out; never can we fully reach every one with this report who has been reached by the first publication. Somehow or other the public is disposed to read that which is of a sensational nature, that which reflects upon somebody's character. Mr. Speaker, I believe the world is getting better every day. I believe political parties are getting better every day. I believe the Republican party is better to-day than it ever was before. I believe the Democratic party is better to-day than it ever was before. I have greater confidence in our institutions, in our Government and its instrumentalities, than I ever had before, and attempts to belittle and break down the confidence of the people in the agencies of self-government I denounce as a crime against the whole people of the United States, unjustified by any facts whatever. Mr. Speaker, I ask to include this testimony I have read in full in my remarks. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print certain testimony in his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to discharge the committee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair lays before the House the following message from the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have received the following letter from the Secretary of War respecting the recent attack by troops of the United States on Mount Dajo:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 13, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The account of the engagement on Mount Dajo, on the island of Jolo, between our forces and a large band of Moro robbers, in which the fighting lasted for three or four days, showed such a large loss among the Moros as to give rise in a part of the public press to the criticism that there had been a wanton destruction by our troops of Moro lives, including those of women and children. Inquiries were made of me by members of the Senate and House of Representatives in respect to the matter. Accordingly I yesterday directed that the following telegram be sent to General Wood:

"It is charged that there was a wanton slaughter of Moros—men, women, and children—in the fight in Jolo at Mount Dajo. I wish you would send me at once all the particulars in respect to this matter, stating exact facts."

General Wood's answer came to-day. It seems to me to show most clearly that the unfortunate loss of life of the men, women, and children among the Moros was wholly unavoidable, in view of their deliberate use of their women and children in actual battle and their fanatical and savage desire that their women and children should perish with them if defeat were to come. They seem to have exhibited in this fight the well-known treachery of the uncivilized Mohammedan when wounded of attempting to kill those approaching for the purpose of giving aid and relief. General Wood's dispatch is as follows:

"The MILITARY SECRETARY, Washington:

"In answer to Secretary of War's request for information March 12, I was present throughout practically entire action and inspected top of crater after action was finished. Am convinced no man, woman, or child was wantonly killed. A considerable number of women and children were killed in the fight—number unknown, for the reason that they were actually in the works when assaulted, and were unavoidably killed in the fierce hand to hand fighting which took place in the narrow inclosed space. Moro women wore trousers and were dressed, armed much like the men, and charged with them. The children were in many cases used by the men as shields while charging troops. These incidents are much to be regretted, but it must be understood that the Moros, one and all, were fighting not only as enemies but religious fanatics, believing Paradise to be their immediate reward if killed in action with Christians. They apparently desired that none be saved. Some of our men, one a hospital steward, were cut up while giving assistance to wounded Moros by the wounded, and by those feigning death for the purpose of getting this vengeance. I personally ordered every assistance given wounded Moros, and that food and water should be sent them and medical attendance. In addition friendly Moros were at once directed to proceed to mountain for this purpose. I do not believe that in this or in any other fight any American soldier wantonly killed a Moro woman or child, or that he ever did it except unavoidably in close action. Action was most desperate, and was impossible for men fighting literally for their lives in close quarters to distinguish who would be injured by fire. In all actions against Moros we have begged Moros again and again to fight as men and keep women and children out of it. I assume entire responsibility for action of the troops in every particular, and if any evidence develops in any way bearing out the charges will act at once.

"WOOD."

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

The PRESIDENT.

I have made reply as follows:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, March 14, 1906.

"MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received your letter of March 13, with accompanying cable of General Wood, answering your inquiry as to the alleged wanton slaughter of Moros. This answer is, of course, entirely satisfactory. The officers and enlisted men under General Wood's command have performed a most gallant and soldierly feat in a way that confers added credit on the American Army. They are entitled to the heartiest admiration and praise of all those of their fellow-citizens who are glad to see the honor of the flag upheld by the courage of the men wearing the American uniform.

"Sincerely, yours,

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"Hon. WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The WHITE HOUSE, March 15, 1906.

The SPEAKER. The message will be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOHN H. PARKER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant (the Senate concurring), I return herewith House bill No. 10588, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John H. Parker."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 15, 1906.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I follow the time-honored custom of addressing the committee on a subject (H. R. 15674) not relating to appropriations at all, but I have little reluctance in doing this as the subject I shall speak on is of the supremest importance, and one, if not early considered, as the Constitution enjoins on Congress, will endanger the fundamental principle of equality upon which our Republic was founded, and which, if not upheld and perpetuated, will inevitably lead to its overthrow.

If the principle of the bill I am about to advocate is to fail, permanently, money bills will become useless; if an apportionment of representation in this body, based on the equality of American individual sovereignty can not be attained, then appropriation bills will, in time, become unnecessary.

Prodigality of the natural rights of man will not be compensated for by economy in appropriations.

Any degree of departure from sound basic principles is as dangerous in governmental affairs as in the exact sciences, and when the departure has gone so far as to demonstrate the error, only the foolish will continue to propagate it. So, when a political error, fundamental in character, has been so far pursued as to demonstrate its certain evil tendency the time is at hand to heroically apply the remedy and avert the impending certain disaster by returning to sound principles.

A republic can not now be and it never has been successfully maintained, based on inequality of citizenship. All ancient and modern attempts to establish or continue a republic founded on castes or class distinctions have signally and rightfully failed. Their wrecks are found all along the line of the ages, only to be pointed to as examples of attempts, in the name of liberty, to oppress the common people. Madame Roland, bowing before a statue of liberty, cried from the scaffold which she had just ascended from the cart that bore her to the guillotine:

Oh, Liberty, how many crimes have been committed in thy name!

It is, moreover, of supreme importance that constitutional injunctions should be obeyed and enforced, and especially where they are primary in character. Partisan heat should never arise nor be displayed over the enforcement of the Constitution. In its obedience, Members of Congress should all stand for it, coolly, calmly, and alike bound by duty and by that oath taken by each:

To support and defend the Constitution of the United States * * * bear true faith and allegiance to the same * * * without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion.

The help of God is invoked to keep this solemn oath.

The Republican party by its latest national declaration is required to enforce the Constitution relating to representation in Congress and in the electoral college; and its resplendent history even more strongly requires its enforcement, especially in the respect just stated. Its history, running over more than half a century, is studded with achievements for humanity won by upholding immutable, governmental, cardinal principles essential to the preservation of the natural rights of man. It will not now permit its decrees, written in the common blood of all the people and races, to be blotted out, and with them witness the certain overthrow of the principles of universal justice and equality upon which our Union was founded and, if perpetuated, must stand. That party will not, if the overthrow of the Union does come through departure from these principles, survive to witness the fatal day. It has the power, under God, to avert the calamity, and to preserve, perpetuate, and transmit through the ages to posterity the Republic in all its purity and accumulated strength and glory.

The special constitutional decrees of war being the work of the Republican party, and its immortal leaders being in their hallowed graves, the duty comes to their successors here and in the executive and judicial departments of the Government to fairly and impartially enforce them according to their true intent and spirit. Duty is often an exacting master, calling for unpleasant action, but those who are honored by special selection, and by their willing acceptance of high public place and responsibility, can not shield themselves from performing their duty because it may be unpleasant to perform it or for any other reason. No congressional and constitutional duty is so great that those who are charged with its performance should shrink from it.

The day of heroism and heroic deeds in statesmanship still abides, and must ever, or through political degeneracy there will soon be nobody to stand guard on the ramparts or around the citadels of the preserved, regenerated, disenthralled, and purified Union.

The preamble to the bill reads:

That whereas the Constitution of the United States, Article XIV, section 2, requires that "when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State;" and whereas existing law (section 22, Revised Statutes United States) enacted in pursuance of said section 2 requires its enforcement by Congress as empowered by such article; and whereas the Congress is satisfied that the right of certain male inhabitants of States hereinafter named, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, at elections therein for some or all of said officers, has been and now is denied, or in some way abridged, in each of said States, and that the representation in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States in each of such States so denying or abridging such right to vote should be reduced as the fourteenth article of the Constitution and the law require, to the end that a republican form of government may be guaranteed therein, based on equal political power among the States of the United States and the Congressional districts thereof, and in the electorial college:

The bill proposes to reduce the number of Representatives in Alabama from 9 to 5, Arkansas from 7 to 5, Florida from 3 to 2, Georgia from 11 to 6, Louisiana from 7 to 3, Mississippi from 8 to 3, North Carolina from 10 to 6; South Carolina from 7 to 3, Tennessee from 10 to 8, Texas from 16 to 12, and Virginia from 10 to 8—a total reduction of 37 Representatives, and, as a consequence, a reduction of the same number in the electoral college by force of paragraph 2, Article II, of the Constitution.

The bill does not provide for the reduction in the States mentioned to the extent the votes cast therein at recent elections would warrant. At least 50 Representatives are now based on disfranchised citizens. It only provides for reduction of Representatives in such States to the number they would each be entitled to, based alone on the white voters therein or the white population thereof, although it is certain large numbers of white voters have been disfranchised in each State; and the votes cast in each would warrant a larger reduction after taking liberally into account the usual number who do not vote for ordinary and natural reasons. The Representatives provided for in the bill could be elected in each of the States named by the number of votes cast therein in 1904—Alabama, by 21,769; Arkansas, by 23,284; Florida, by 19,654; Georgia, by 21,644; Louisiana, by 17,970; Mississippi, by 19,461; North Carolina, by 38,711; South Carolina, by 18,971; Tennessee, by 30,345; Texas, by 19,500, and Virginia, by 14,100—while the average number of votes cast in the same year in the other thirty-four States to elect one Member was 41,325, and in most of them the number cast was much greater, as the accompanying table shows. The average vote to elect a Member in Illinois in 1904 was 43,059; Indiana, 52,475; New York, 43,723; Ohio, 47,828, and Missouri, 40,241, etc.

Notwithstanding the small vote in the disfranchising States, the average vote in all the States (1904) to elect a Representative was 35,025.

The bill does not undertake to provide for or in any manner regulate either white or colored suffrage in the States mentioned. That is solely a matter for the States, subject to the limitation of the fifteenth amendment.

The purpose of the bill, as it recites, is to equalize, so far as possible, political power among the several States and Congressional districts thereof, and in the electoral college, and to the end that a republican form of government may be secured in the States named.

It must be assumed that the last apportionment among the States was fairly made, according to their respective numbers, on the ratio of 194,182 inhabitants. This apportionment remains unaffected, save as to disfranchising States. If one or more States deny or abridge the right of some of its white or colored male citizens, over 21 years of age, to vote, it does not change in other States the constitutional rule of apportionment based on the number of inhabitants. The right of Congress to reduce representation applies only to a State that has disfranchised some of its natural voting citizens, and representation in the other States remains unaffected.

It is not a valid objection to a reduction of representation in one State to show that a reduction should also be made for the same or any reason in another or other States. The second section of the fourteenth amendment speaks of reducing representation in an offending State; hence each State must be considered separately.

Necessarily some inequality as to numbers must exist in districts created by State law, but this does not result in disfranchisement, nor does it destroy the political equality of the States which results from individual disfranchisement.

This is not the time, nor is it necessary here, to show how the constitutions and laws and practices in the States named deny or in some manner abridge the right of male citizens 21 years of age to vote. That they have operated to and still do this is or should be conceded. The exact nature of the provisions of law or practices is wholly unimportant, either as affecting the inequality of political power between States and Congressional districts or the power of Congress to correct such inequality as the Constitution requires. It is not material to voters of States whose votes express only a fraction of the political power possessed by voters in disfranchising States how the inequality has been brought about. The fact is the important thing to be looked at.

Does disfranchisement exist in the States named in the bill within the meaning of the Constitution?

To the result of the operation of the State constitutional provisions and laws and practices in conducting elections we look for the answer to this controlling question.

Both white and colored voters have been denied the right to vote, or such right has been, in some manner, abridged in a substantial sense in each of the several States named. The more recent elections prove the truth of this statement in a singularly emphatic way.

I submit a table of white and colored population and voters, votes cast, etc., which will be found instructive and demonstrative:

Table showing white and colored (negro) population and voters in each State, according to the census of 1900; present number of Representatives; also number each State would have if apportioned on white voters alone; also total number of votes cast in each State in 1902 and 1904, and average vote cast for Representative in 1902 and 1904 in each State.

(Unless otherwise stated, the census of 1900 and the election of 1904 are hereinafter referred to.)

This table shows that Alabama, with 9 Representatives, has a white voting population of 232,294, and that the vote cast in the election of 1904 was 108,845; Arkansas, with 7 Representatives, has a white voting population of 226,597, and that the vote cast was 116,421; Florida, with 3 Representatives, has a white voting population of 77,962, and that the vote cast was 39,307; Georgia, with 11 Representatives, has a white voting population of 277,496, and that the vote cast was 129,867; Louisiana, with 7 Representatives, has a white voting population of 177,878, and that the vote cast was 53,908; Mississippi, with 8 Representatives, has a white voting population of 150,530, and that the vote cast was 58,383; North Carolina, with 10 Representatives, has a white voting population of 289,263, and that the vote cast was 206,134; South Carolina, with 7 Representatives, has a white voting population of 130,375, and that the vote cast was 56,912; Tennessee, with 10 Representatives, has a white voting population of 375,046, and that the vote cast was 242,756; Texas, with 16 Representatives, has a white voting population of 599,961, and that the vote cast was 234,008; and Virginia, with 10 Representatives, has a white voting population of 301,379, and that the vote cast was 129,103.

It thus appears that these 11 States have 98 Representatives and 120 electors and a total of white voters of 2,838,781, and that they cast 1,375,644 votes—less than one-half the number of white voters.

It will be seen that New York, with 37 Representatives and 39 electors and a white voting population of 2,145,057, cast 1,617,770 votes, above 200,000 more than were cast in the 11 named States, to elect 98 Representatives and 120 electors.

New York in 1904, in electing 37 Representatives and 39 electors, cast 1,617,770 votes, while Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, and Louisiana, in electing 37 Representatives and 47 electors, cast 448,348 votes—less than one-third the number cast in New York.

Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, and North Carolina together have a white population of 4,390,629 and 37 Representatives, while New York has a white population of 7,156,881 and only 37 Representatives. The four States have 45 electors.

The same four States cast in 1904, in electing the 37 Members, 564,152 votes, while New York the same year cast 1,617,770 votes to elect 37 Members—above three times as many as the four States. On the basis of white voters the four States would be entitled to 22 Members and New York to 45—more than double.

Pennsylvania in 1904, in electing 32 Representatives and 34 electors, cast 1,234,738 votes, while Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina, in electing 32 Representatives and 42 electors, cast 317,355 votes—about one-fourth the number cast in Pennsylvania.

Mississippi, Kansas, and California each has 8 Members and 10 electors. Mississippi, with 150,530 white voters, in 1904 polled 58,383 votes to elect 8, while Kansas, with 398,552 white voters, polled—same year—324,588 votes, and California, with 489,545 white voters, polled—same year—331,433 votes each to elect the same number of Representatives and electors as Mississippi. In 1902 Mississippi polled only 18,058 to elect 8 Members of the House.

Maine, with 4 Representatives and 6 electors and a white voting population of 216,856, cast 96,040 votes, while Mississippi, with a white voting population of 150,530, cast 58,383 votes and elected 8 Representatives and 10 electors.

Massachusetts, with 14 Representatives and 16 electors and a white voting population of 830,049, cast 445,098 votes, while Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi, with a white voting population of 865,261, cast 376,864 votes and elected 34 Representatives and 44 electors.

Indiana, with 13 Representatives and 15 electors and a white voting population of 701,761, cast 682,185 votes, while Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina, with a white voting population of 536,745, cast 208,510 votes to elect 25 Representatives and 33 electors.

Delaware, with 1 Representative and 3 electors and a white voting population of 45,592, cast 43,856 votes, while Florida, with a white voting population of 77,962, cast 39,307 to elect 3 Representatives and 5 electors.

So Illinois, with 25 Representatives and 27 electors and a white voting population of 1,370,209, cast 1,076,497 votes, while Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina, with a white voting population of 536,745, cast 208,510 votes (less than one-fifth of Illinois) to elect 25 Representatives and 33 electors.

Colorado, with 3 Representatives, cast an average vote for each of 81,227.

Montana, with 1 Representative, cast 64,444 votes.

Utah, with 1 Representative, cast 101,624 votes, and Idaho, with 1 Representative, cast 72,583 votes—in each instance much larger than the total votes cast in a number of the disfranchising States.

The white vote—Democratic—in 1872 and before disfranchisement began was much larger in Mississippi and other States in the South than the entire vote in recent years, though the white population was then much less.

Mississippi, South Carolina, Alabama, and Louisiana, with 31 Members of the House and 39 electors, having an aggregate white vote of 691,077, polled (1904) an aggregate vote of 278,048, while Ohio, having 1,180,599 white voters, polled (same year) 1,004,393 votes to elect her 21 Representatives and 23 electors—that is, the four States, with more than 300,000 less white voters and only a little more than one-fourth the actual vote cast in Ohio, elected 10 more Representatives and 16 more electors than Ohio.

Ohio in 1904, in electing 21 Representatives and 23 electors, cast 1,004,393 votes, while Arkansas, Louisiana, and South Carolina, in electing 21 Representatives and 27 electors, cast 227,241 votes—only a little more than one-fifth of Ohio's vote.

Kentucky, with a white voting population of 469,206 cast 435,765 votes (1904) to elect 11 Representatives and 13 electors, while Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina, with an aggregate white voting population of 995,636, cast 433,776 votes (2,000 less than Kentucky) to elect 41 Representatives and 53 electors.

Rhode Island cast 68,656 votes (1904) to elect 2 Representatives and South Carolina cast 56,912 and Louisiana 53,908 votes each to elect 7, and Mississippi cast 58,383 votes to elect 8 Representatives.

Missouri, once a slave State, cast 643,861 votes to elect 16 Representatives, while Mississippi to elect 8 Representatives cast only 58,383, less than one-eleventh the vote of Missouri. In the tenth Missouri district alone there were cast 58,533 votes, more than were cast in Mississippi or South Carolina the same year. This is true of districts in other States.

Iowa with a white voting population of 630,655 cast (1904) 485,703 votes, and Mississippi with a white voting population of 150,530 cast 58,383 votes to elect 8 Representatives, and Florida with a white voting population of 77,962 cast 39,307 votes to elect 3 Representatives, the two electing 11 Representatives, the same number as Iowa, and two more electors.

In 1902 there were many districts in which the Democrats cast a vote greater than the entire vote in Mississippi (18,058), and it failed to elect anybody. The 3d Ohio (Mr. Nevin's) district is an instance of this kind.

Many other comparisons may be made, all demonstrating the inequality among the States arising out of the constitutions, laws, and practices in disfranchising States.

Comparisons with votes in 1902 will show more strongly against such States in most cases. This is particularly true as to Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Tennessee.

There are many single districts in natural voting States that cast more votes to elect one Member than were cast in 1902 or 1904 in the States of Louisiana, South Carolina, or Florida.

In Alabama the total vote (1904) was: First district, 6,986; second, 10,178; third, 9,265; fourth, 9,288; fifth, 13,248; sixth, 11,591; seventh, 17575; eighth, 11,744; ninth, 11,767; and the average vote therein was 12,093. In Arkansas it was: First district, 14,493; second, 14,453; third, 17,266; fourth, 15,660; fifth, 18,661; sixth, 15,319; seventh, 14,279, and the average vote therein was 16,631. In Florida it was: First district, 11,205; second, 13,882; third, 7,671, and the average vote therein was 13,102. In Georgia it was: First district, 7,368; second, 8,041; third, 6,975; fourth, 8,572; fifth, 13,147; sixth, 7,463; seventh, 14,962; eighth, 8,568; ninth, 18,813; tenth, 9,394; eleventh, 12,891, and the average vote therein was 11,806. In Louisiana it was: First district, 10,195; second, 10,750; third, 6,687; fourth, 6,325; fifth, 6,024; sixth, 6,072; seventh, 6,454, and the average vote therein was 7,701. In Mississippi it was: First district, 8,049; second, 7,279; third, 3,744; fourth, 7,135; fifth, 9,454; sixth, 5,730; seventh, 7,012; eighth, 4,934, and the average vote therein was 7,297. In North Carolina it was: First district, 16,232; second, 13,983; third, 16,141; fourth, 17,835; fifth, 28,120; sixth, 13,963; seventh, 21,628; eighth, 30,925; ninth, 23,777; tenth, 26,220, and the average vote therein was 20,613. In South Carolina it was: First district, 6,648; second, 7,845; third, 7,801; fourth, 8,735; fifth, 8,099; sixth, 8,729; seventh, 9,289, and the average vote therein was 8,130. In Tennessee it was: First district, 28,536; second, 22,097; third, 31,076; fourth, 25,076; fifth, 19,773; sixth, 17,546; seventh, 16,299; eighth, 24,847; ninth, 21,669; tenth, 17,902; and the average vote therein was 24,275. In Texas it was: First district, 14,132; second, 10,350; third, 11,427; fourth, 12,390; fifth, 12,254; sixth, 9,310; seventh, 8,147; eighth, 26,606; ninth, 12,190; tenth, 14,372; eleventh, 9,747; twelfth, 10,634; thirteenth, 17,115; fourteenth, 12,325; fifteenth, 17,401; sixteenth, 17,177, and the average vote therein was 14,625. In Virginia it was: First district, 10,157; second, 13,782; third, 14,714; fourth, 7,074; fifth, 13,686; sixth, 11,227; seventh, 14,000; eighth, 10,429; ninth, 27,604; tenth, 13,975, and the average vote therein was 12,910.

In 1902 the total vote for Representatives in most of these States was materially less; the lowest for a Member in Alabama was 5,974, and the highest 17,581; in Arkansas, lowest, 4,796, and highest, 5,817; in Florida, lowest, 4,249, and highest, 6,494; in Georgia, lowest, 2,485, and highest, 5,694; in Louisiana, lowest, 2,723, and highest, 5,882; in Mississippi, lowest, 1,146, and highest, 3,245; in North Carolina, lowest, 12,823, and highest, 29,790; in South Carolina, lowest, 3,924, and highest, 5,381; in Tennessee, lowest, 8,928 and the highest, 25,125.

Texas in the last Presidential election year polled 53,784 and Virginia 71,406 votes less than in 1902, the average vote for a Member in that year in Texas being 17,978 and in Virginia 20,050.

In no one of the States named in the bill was the average vote cast (1904) for a Representative equal to one-half the average vote cast for one in the other States. In some instances (two) it did not reach one-fifth; in others not one-fourth, and in all, save two, was below one-third.

Most of the States have a long history of disfranchisement, conclusively proving that their constitutions, laws, and plans, and the practices therein relative to elections have been effective. Some States did not get their constitutions and laws into operation until in recent years. Virginia, for example, in 1902 cast 200,509 votes, but under her later methods of disfranchisement her vote went down, in 1904, to 129,103.

The Houston Daily Post (March 7, 1906) says:

The vote of Texas dropped from 560,000 in 1892 to 235,000 in 1904, although in the latter year there were in the State 250,000 more males of voting age than in 1892. The vote of the State is steadily falling, notwithstanding the fact that the population of the State is increasing at the rate of nearly 4 per cent annually. It is scarcely probable that the total vote of the State next November will exceed 200,000, although the potential voters of the State number 1,000,000.

The vote of other States has fallen off in like manner. Where free suffrage is the rule in general, above 20 per cent of the population vote. In New York it is above and in Ohio it is about 25 per cent. So of some other States.

Assuming negroes did not vote at all in Alabama the percentage of the white population who voted in 1904 was about 10; Arkansas, about 11; Florida, about 13; Georgia, about 11; Louisiana, less than 8; Mississippi, about 9; North Carolina, about 17; South Carolina, about 10; Tennessee, less than 16; Texas, less than 10, and Virginia, less than 11 per cent. If some negroes voted in any of these States the percentage of whites who voted was proportionately less.

The severest criticism on the bill that can be fairly made is that it does not make all the reduction the facts warrant and the Constitution requires. The friends of the bill, however, prefer to err in favor of the disfranchising States. No one of the States not included in the bill, save Nevada, elected in 1902 or 1904 its Representatives with an average vote as small as would be the average vote in each of the eleven disfranchising States in electing the number of Representatives provided for in the bill if the votes cast should not exceed those of 1904, excepting Georgia, North Carolina,, and Tennessee. In general, it may be said that with the bill a law, and disfranchisement continuing as now, there will be twice as many votes to elect a Representative in the States not affected by it as in any of the States included in it.

For example, West Virginia (1904), with five Representatives and seven electors and 233,129 white voters, cast 239,923 votes, while Virginia, with 301,379 white voters, cast 129,103 votes to elect ten Representatives and twelve electors. The average number of votes cast to elect a Representative in West Virginia was 47,984, while in Virginia it was 12,910. Virginia did not poll a number equal to one-half her white voters and West Virginia polled a number in excess of her white voters. In the former State disfranchisement was effectual, in the latter it did not exist.

By the rule of numbers all citizens are given representation, but those who are disfranchised are wholly without it; and nothing justifies the transfer of their voting rights to those who disfranchise them, thereby giving them a political or voting power not possessed by voters in other States or districts. Each naturally qualified voter should exercise his own sovereign right as a citizen of the Republic, and on being deprived of this right it must remain unexercised. If he is in any manner deprived of such right by his State no right is vested in it to transfer his lost right to others of his State, thereby conferring on its voting citizens a political power in national affairs not possessed by voting citizens of other States; and this is not only against the just, reasonable, and natural principles of our Republic, founded as it was, necessarily, on the universal equality and the natural rights of all free citizens thereof, as its founders declared in all their polity as well as in the Declaration of Independence. The fourteenth amendment, in clear and express terms, requires Congress to prevent, by a defined rule of reduction of representation, this invasion of the rights of voters in States, thereby recognizing the primary rule of the founders of the Republic.

NOT REPUBLICAN IN FORM.

To concentrate the political power of a State in the hands of the few, or into the control of even a majority of its citizens, they to enjoy the power all the citizens thereof might possess, leads to that injustice between States we have pointed out, and to a form of government not republican; and, if tolerated, must lead to aristocracy, autocracy, and monarchy, wherein political slavery will necessarily prevail, and the voting citizens of a State thus governed would possess unequal political power in the choice of a President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress.

The Constitution (sec. 4, Art. IV) provides that this shall not occur without a remedy. It reads:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government.

The Constitution (sec. 2, Art. IV) also provides that:

> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

And section 1 of the fourteenth amendment reiterates this provision, thus:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

These provisions are violated if certain citizens of one or more States are granted a voting power not enjoyed by citizens of other States.

And it is enjoined on Congress (sec. 8, Art. I):

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested in this Constitution in the Government of the United States.

The proviso that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government was fiercely assailed by those opposed to the ratification of the Constitution, but its importance was as fiercely maintained by those who framed the Constitution. This proviso is the sole one authorizing the Federal power to interfere with the polity of a State and correct a departure from republican principles by guaranteeing to it a republican form of government. This right, it was maintained, must rest somewhere, and could best be vested in a plenary way in the United States through its congressional power. The power intended to be granted by the proviso was not then denied; its wisdom and necessity only was assailed. James Madison, one of the framers of the Constitution, though conservative in his interpretation, in 1788, in the Federalist (No. 43), speaking of the importance of the proviso, says:

> In a confederacy founded on republican principles and composed of republican members, the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchial innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained.
> But a right implies a remedy, and where else could the remedy be deposited than where it is deposited by the constitution? Governments of dissimilar principles and forms have been found less adapted to a federal coalition of any sort than those of a kindred nature.

To guard against "aristocratic or monarchial innovations" or "governments [States] of dissimilar principles and forms" being joined in the same coalition were the things intended to be prevented—this to secure uniformity and to avert the danger of their falling apart through lack of harmony of purpose and to avoid dissatisfaction among the States through an unequal political national power some States and their citizens might acquire over other States and their citizens.

Cooley and other expounders of the Constitution support the Federalist.

What more certain way to bring about dissensions than to allow some States, through a small number of voting citizens, to have a greater political power than other States with a much larger number of voting citizens?

The political enslavement of some of the citizens of the United States for causes other than crime is the destruction of our boasted liberty, and enters us upon the road to aristocracy, autocracy, and monarchy, especially when the few of some States or localities usurp the rights of the whole, producing inequality of political power among voters of the several States, and in some cases among voters of districts of the same State. There are instances in North Carolina and Tennessee where the lowest vote in a district is little more than one-half of the vote in other districts; in Texas this is also the case, and in some districts the vote is less, or only about one third the vote in others of the same State.

Any abridgment of the right to vote of citizens of the United States residing in a State, for causes other than crime, constitutes an "aristocratic or monarchial innovation." Especially is this true where more than one-half the natural voters in a State are deprived of all political power, as is now confessedly the case in Mississippi and South Carolina, considering only disfranchised colored citizens therein.

Greece was undone, says Montesquieu, as soon as the King of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphyctions.

The Roman Republic fell through an unequal exercise of political power.

The once so-called confederated republics of Germany consisted of free cities and petty states subject to different rulers, and being unequal in centralized power were inharmonious and without political cohesion and consequently impossible of perpetuation. Holland was much freer from such conditions. Switzerland's cantons were substantially equal in national affairs, though not absolutely so in local respects. She still so exists in the midst of European monarchies.

The equalizing of political power is therefore not only required by section two of the fourteenth amendment, but by primary requirements of the Constitution as originally adopted. How else is a republican form of government in each State to be guaranteed, or the citizens thereof secured "all the privileges or immunities of citizens in the several States?"

To allow a few citizens of one State to enjoy the privilege of casting their votes in electing a President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress, while in other States double or triple the number of voters do not equal them in political power, is to regard the voters of the other States as unfit or unworthy to exercise equal political power in Federal affairs.

WHAT CONSTITUTES DISFRANCHISEMENT.

Disfranchisement is an evolution in most of the States where it exists. It commenced in the early days of reconstruction—in Kuklux days—and when election frauds were common, by the use of tissue and other fraudulent ballots, by the shotgun policy, by dishonestly refusing registration, by failing to count or return ballots cast, by false election returns, and by intimidation through riots at the polls. Then came the more convenient and less violent methods whereby, sometimes, under the forms of law, citizens are prevented from registering, going to the polls, or voting.

The privileged few knew well that to encourage or to allow the masses of white voters to vote would result in some of them aspiring to hold offices, a right only the elect few claim for themselves.

In 1904 in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Texas, and Virginia less than one-half of the white voters voted; and in Mississippi and South Carolina but a little more than one-third voted; in Florida just about one-half voted, and in North Carolina and Tennessee a little more than one-half voted.

It is claimed that, owing to systems of primary elections to nominate candidates, voters do not take any interest in the elections, and because there is seldom any opposition candidates to Democratic candidates but few vote. Taking this as true in general in the States named, it proves that the right of the natural voters to vote has been abridged within the meaning of the Constitution.

A State must take the consequence of conditions which prevail in it. If by its constitution, laws and manner of executing them, and the general conditions of society and the conduct of its people the rights of its citizens in considerable numbers are withheld from them, or they are generally deprived of a right they would naturally desire and seek to enjoy, especially one like the right to vote at an election for President and Vice-President, or for a Representative in Congress, then it is clear such rights are denied them, or, at least, abridged.

In the years of secession or rebellion all acts of the so-called Confederate States were unconstitutional and without warrant of legal authority, as the courts have held, yet the conditions existing, however illegally produced, entailed on such States and their people a responsibility that they could not and did not escape.

Citizenship in the United States, as guaranteed by the first section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, carries with it individual sovereignty which can only be exercised through the ballot, and a denial of the ballot or any abridgment of its enjoyment in any manner by a State renders it subject to a proportionate reduction of its representation. This sovereignty is never lightly surrendered or neglected, especially by the less favored classes of our people. They are jealous of this one sovereign right which they understand they ought to be allowed to enjoy on a footing with the wealthiest or more favored class. The humblest citizens are the most reliable voters everywhere in our Republic unless causes beyond their control prevent their voting. Voting is the one right they never willingly surrender; hence when the masses of voters, white or colored, do not vote, it is because their right to enjoy that privilege has been denied or in some manner abridged. It follows that where a number less than one-half of the white voters, to say nothing of the colored voters, do not vote, it may be conclusively assumed that it is not of their own volition, but because their enjoyment of the right is in some way denied or abridged. Why Mississippi should cast only 7,297, Louisiana 7,701, and South Carolina 8,130 votes, on an average, to elect a Member of this House, while Missouri cast 40,241 and Kentucky cast 39,615 votes (all once slave), on an average, to elect a Member, can only be accounted for on this assumption. To refuse to register a voter or to refuse to accept at the ballot box a voter's ballot or to not count and return it when cast is as effectual a denial or abridgment of his right to vote as to forbid his voting by State law. Suppose no attempt was made to prevent citizens from voting and they were freely invited and encouraged to do so, yet the law of the State required or allowed returning boards to throw out such votes as they pleased, and they did so, would it still be contended that there was no denial or abridgment of the right to vote? The scheme of denial or abridgment is wholly immaterial.

The Constitution only regards the fact. If the shotgun policy which once prevailed in certain parts still prevailed as then with popular acquiescence or approval, it would also be a denial of the citizen's right to vote, or an abridgment of such right. If the people of a State persist in denying the right of large numbers of its citizens by any policy of intimidation or fraud through its election machinery or election officers, the denial is none the less effectual than if it results from State law or a constitutional provision. So the fact, appearing from year to year that only a fraction of the natural number of voters in a State actually vote, becomes convincing that the others are substantially all denied the ballot or that their right to vote is in some manner abridged.

A disfranchised voter has not the right and can not confer on another or others the right to vote for him, nor can his State. The power of the ballot is nontransferable; it can not be delegated; it admits of no agency; it is the only mode of exercising individual sovereignty by the citizen, and in its exercise there are no political or class castes, degrees, or distinctions; and by the ballot the humblest citizen of the United States is enabled to stand at the polls abreast, and as the peer, of the wealthy, the most haughty and aspiring in the Republic. With the ballot in hand, the humblest of our people stand equal by the side of those who assume superiority or supremacy, and by its power injustice and oppression may be averted, and the unworthy in high places may be cast down, the Union upheld, and the rights of man preserved and maintained when in danger. The ballot stands for law against the lawless, for official honesty against dishonesty, and without it and its equal exercise there can not long be maintained in its integrity a union of States, with a common purpose such as ours was intended to be, in fact as well as in name, and to be perpetuated through time.

The Declaration of Independence (1776) and the Articles of Confederation (1778) and the Constitution our forefathers framed (1787), were each based on the fundamental idea of equality in making and administering the laws, in the choice of executive officers, and of representatives in legislative bodies. The central idea was individual equality of citizenship; this to escape the fetters of oppression that had been forged by the King and Parliament of England.

Taxation without representation led to the Declaration of Independence, to revolution, to war, to the founding of our new great Republic, and to the Constitution of the United States for the government of a free people by a free people, under one flag, with one destiny, and to a nation now first of the powers of earth.

The defiant cry of our Revolutionary fathers was:

Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute.

The ship of state, armored and protected by the Constitution, has ridden for above a century and a quarter the stormy billows of mighty political seas, coming at times close to danger shoals and rocks and reefs, barely escaping the doom of destruction common to all nations, monarchies, or republics that recognized or tolerated human slavery; and it was saved only by the irresistible might of Divine power, embodied and worked out through the equal rights of man as written in the original Constitution, reenforced by the three amendments—decrees of successful war—engrossed in the blood of the fallen heroes who fought for and against the natural and equal rights of humanity and for universal liberty.

If we have drifted from a safe anchorage it is our duty at the earliest time possible to take soundings anew and right the proud old ship of State and keep her on a course where she may ride in eternal safety.

Our country, thus typified, should continue to be not only first of the earth, but an example to be imitated through time by nations desiring to govern their people humanely, recognizing at all times and under all circumstances the equality of all participating in the governing power; and to be pointed to by the oppressed of all lands as a country of the free and as a warning to oppressing nations that, in God's time sooner or later to come, they too must yield to a freer and better government and grant equal liberty to their subjects or the common fate of nations founded on inequality and tyranny will come. The world is just now witnessing the defiant, autocratic, despotic empire of the Czar of Russia surrender its long continuing power of the centuries on the demand of her mighty hosts of long-oppressed subjects. The fates and God alike are inexorable.

The claim that reduction of representation can only be enforced as a punishment or to penalize a State merely because it will not allow the negro to vote, or that it should not be done because, by possibility, representation in other States should also be reduced, is unfounded. There is no such thing as penalizing a State under the Constitution. It works no wrong or injustice to enforce the Constitution, and nothing enjoined by it is sectional, and not to enforce it propagates a wrong, works unequality in, and continues injustice to States that allow the citizens of the United States residing therein to vote. These latter States are penalized by not enforcing the Constitution. To refuse or neglect to enforce the Constitution in any respect shows disregard of it, and if persisted in will lead to its destruction. That other States not mentioned in the bill should suffer a reduction of representation is not worthy of consideration, for if such is the case then the same rule of reduction should be applied. That other guilty persons have escaped punishment has been a common complaint of offenders about to be brought to justice ever since Cain killed Abel.

But the Constitution is directed against a State which denies or abridges suffrage, and the necessity for reduction in one State does not require or authorize reduction or increase of representation in any other State or States. Save in disfranchising States, as already stated, the rule of apportionment based on numbers is unchanged. (Sec. 2, Art. XIV.)

With all the expedients at work, how are we to determine the extent of the denial or abridgment, save by actual results in normal election years? It is not pretended that if the election returns do not show that all the voting population of a State have voted, the presumption of disfranchisement arises. It is not to be presumed that all of the voting population of a State who do not vote are disfranchised, for in all the States, through usual and natural causes (such as illness, bad weather, bad roads, inconvenient voting places, natural indisposition, etc.), many do not vote who would be allowed to vote, but it is fair to presume that where the vote is unnaturally small the fault is with the State.

Recurring to the amendment we see that the denial or abridgment must be in the right to vote for President, Vice-President, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State or the members of the legislature thereof. If the denial or abridgment is only as to one of the enumerated classes of officers reduction of representation in Congress is still required. Just why this was made so may not be very clear, for State, executive, and judicial officers and legislators have no direct connection with Federal officers or influence over their action. The executive of a State, however, often has the right to appoint a Senator, and legislatures elect Senators and also form Congressional districts, while the State judiciary construes election laws.

Whatever the reason may have been, it is clear that Congress is given power to reduce representation in a State when citizens with a natural right to vote are deprived of it in either of the cases named. So, even though there was no disfranchisement in a State in an election for President, Vice-President, or Members of Congress, and it existed in electing either of the State officers or legislators named, the right of reduction would still exist. This shows the great care of the framers of the amendment to secure, and how important they regarded such right. In all respects the proviso was drawn to the end that its purpose could not be defeated. To provide that reduction should follow when the right to vote is denied was evidently not deemed sufficient to accomplish the desired end, hence, later in the sentence, the words "or in any way abridged" appear. The Congress had, as the debate shows, a fixed purpose to provide for the equalization of the voting power among voting citizens of the several States in case any one or more of them denied, or in any manner abridged, suffrage therein.

Nor does the language provide that such denial shall be by lawful or unlawful methods; it is sufficient if it is accomplished in fact, with or without State law, or with or without the forms of law. If done by intimidation or by violence of communities, organized or unorganized, or by fraud, either in the common practices of dominant people of the State, or in the execution or administration by its officers of the constitutions and laws thereof relating to elections, or by other evasive methods, the result is the same as though done under the ordinary and direct forms of law, and the consequence must be the same. What boots it to the wronged voters of nondisfranchising States and districts how the disfranchising was brought about? Their rights are invaded the same, regardless of the expedients or devices resorted to.

The amendment, being benign in character (118 U. S., 356) and intended to secure personal rights, not to defeat them, is therefore entitled to a liberal construction (an established rule of construction in courts of justice) to the end that its purpose may be accomplished.

That disfranchisement may be accomplished within the meaning of section 2 of the amendment may be regarded as judicially settled by our Supreme Court in the Williams case (170 U. S., 213), wherein Mississippi's election laws were drawn in question, and involving a clause of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment relating to a denial by a State of the "equal protection of the laws" to citizens of the United States. The court held that the case (one involving jurors) as presented, or the Mississippi statute on its face, did not show a denial to the complainant of his right to the equal protection of the laws, and therefore was not entitled to the relief prayed for; yet it made clear, without dissent, that if a case had been made showing that through the administration of the election laws the plaintiff had been deprived of any right, he would have been entitled to relief.

I quote from the opinion:

> There is no charge against the officers to whom is submitted the selection of grand or petit jurors, or those who procure the lists of jurors. There is an allegation of the purpose of the convention to disfranchise citizens of the colored race, but with this we have no concern, unless the purpose is executed by the constitution or laws or by those who administer them. If it is done in the latter way, how or by what means should be shown.

This case cites and affirms the California laundry case (118 U. S., 356), wherein it is held that public authorities charged with the administration of a law or ordinance represent the State, and that they may act so unequally and oppressively "as to amount to a practical denial by the State" of the equal protection of the laws. I quote from the latter case:

> And the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the State itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners, as to all other persons, by the broad and benign provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution. This principle of interpretation has been sanctioned in 92 U. S., 259; 92 U. S., 275; 100 U. S., 339; 103 U. S., 370, and 113 U. S., 703.

The clause, however, of section 1 of the amendment requires an absolute denial of the equal protection of the laws, hence not to be compared with the clause in question in section 2, which contains the broad, qualifying words "or in any way abridged;" that is, "in any way" reduced, cut down, shortened, though not denied. Hence, if the right to vote is not actually denied, but only in some way abridged, the rule of reduction obtains.

There is not time now to review and show how the constitutions and laws and their administration operate or have operated to disfranchise white and colored citizens alike, or the varied means devised to reach that end. As an example and illustration I quote from a Mississippi supreme court case (20 So. Rep., 865) to show the many expedients resorted to:

> Within the field of permissible action under the limitations proposed by the Federal Constitution, the convention swept the field of expedients, to obstruct the exercise of suffrage by the negro race. And further the court said, speaking of the negro race: By reason of its previous condition of servitude and dependencies, this race had acquired or accentuated certain peculiarities of habit, of temperament, and of character, which clearly distinguished it as a race from the whites. A patient, docile people; but careless, landless, migratory within narrow limits, without forethought; and its criminal members given to furtive offenses, rather than the robust crimes of the whites. Restrained by the Federal Constitution from discriminating against the negro race, the convention discriminates against its characteristics, and the offenses to which its criminal members are prone.

But if the laws of a State are so ineffective, or so poorly administered, or society therein is so vicious, so disorganized, and so chaotic that large numbers of its citizens are not able, or not allowed, to enjoy the elective franchise, the State must be held to have denied or abridged the right to enjoy it. In other words, the State is so far responsible for a proper organized government within it that it can not escape consequences on the puerile plea that it does not deny or abridge natural rights to citizens of the United States by express or direct provisions of law, but only by sinister and evasive expedients, or by the unjust administration of the laws. If negroes are disfranchised as effectually by laws other than such as would discriminate against them on account of race or color, or through the wrongful administration of laws, or from violence, or fraud, or in consequence of a condition of society existing in a State, the result is the same; and the same evil effect on other States and their voters likewise results, calling as imperatively for the remedy the Constitution provides as if there was a denial or abridgment of the right to vote by express provisions of organic law. The framers of the amendment had a purpose to attain, and they used language to compass it, which can not be overridden by mere technical construction.

It is inconceivable that the great, earnest, and learned statesmen who framed the fourteenth amendment did so on the theory that it was only applicable to a State that denied or abridged the right of citizens to vote therein by open, honest, and direct proceedings, and that it was not designed to be applicable to a State that accomplished disfranchisement through fraud, chicanery, violence, indirection, by unjust and unfriendly administration of law, or without law, or by "sweeping the field of expedients to obstruct the exercise of suffrage by the negro race." To admit the latter as their theory of the constitutional provision presupposes that they framed it as a mode of encouraging and inducing the most sinister and vicious of methods, and as a premium therefor.

The amendment had for its object the equalizing of the voting power of citizens of the different States, and to accomplish this no regard was paid to the methods used to acquire unequal power.

It is not proposed here to review the constitutions and laws of the several States. This is largely unnecessary, save, possibly, as to a few of them, as disfranchisement is openly avowed and boasted of by public officers, prominent men, and the public press in many of the States named in the bill.

A State must be held responsible for the conditions existing in it, especially in so far as they affect political rights of other States and their citizens, and this whether the conditions result from law or lawlessness.

It is said an educational test does not disfranchise, nor a poll tax. Whatever might be a defense to a personal claim for relief if one could be preferred by a disfranchised voter against officers for refusing his vote in such tests, it is certain that others in the disfranchising States can not become, individually or collectively, endowed through them with increased national political power, or that States wherein there are no such tests, and their citizens, must thereby lose a share of their political power in the Republic. What is contended for, and only that, is that a vote in one State shall count for as much in the Republic as a vote in any other State. To say a citizen should, or could, learn to read, and could or should have money and pay a poll tax does not tend to show there was no denial or abridgment of his right to vote within the meaning of the Constitution. Whatever operates to prevent suffrage in a State is a denial or abridgment of it. But an educational test in a State that is not designed to promote education, but only to disfranchise citizens, is an abridgment of the right to vote. And a poll tax that is not imposed as a means of raising revenue and not even collectible by law of parties financially responsible is simply a like abridgment. Registration laws impossible to be complied with on the part of the natural voter, taking into account his condition as to education or property, is also a denial or abridgment of his right to vote.

Laws are made with reference to existing conditions and the purposes designed to be accomplished. Their purpose and the motives of the legislators in enacting them—> may be disclosed on the face of the acts, or be inferrable from their operation, considered with reference to the condition of the country and existing legislation.

> * * * * * * *
> The motives of the legislators, considered as the purposes they had in view, will always be presumed to be to accomplish that which follows as the natural and reasonable effect of their enactments. (170 U. S., 704, 710.)

It was the understanding, as repeatedly stated while the fourteenth amendment was under consideration in Congress, that the negro might be disfranchised because of illiteracy and for reasons other than on account of color. Senator Fessenden, of Maine, in a speech delivered while the amendment was pending in the Senate so stated, as did others. They then said they feared such disfranchisement would come, but that a consequent reduction of representation would restore and preserve equal Federal political power among the States and all the voters thereof, and might lead to the negro being educated to prepare him for suffrage.

Mr. Garfield, since President of the United States, also one of the framers of the amendment, expressed similar views (September 6, 1871).

Mr. Shellabarger, of Ohio (December 12, 1871), one of the greatest of statesmen, a profound lawyer, who brought his legal learning to bear on all important national and political questions, also a framer of the amendment, in a speech here, bore testimony as to the meaning and purpose of the amendment as understood by those who prepared it. He then said that its purpose was to secure equality here, and in the electoral college by a reduction of representation if disfranchisement came on account of educational or property qualification, or on any other account. Speaking of such qualifications he said:

> You have your choice. The design of this constitutional amendment was that the poor man, the ignorant man, the colored man, should be secured, should be guaranteed his right to vote; that the States should not deprive him of this right of representation except by taking the consequences of not having in this Hall representation for those of his class.

It follows that an administration of the constitution and laws of a State, regardless of what they are, which prevents citizens from voting, results also in such denial or abridgment. The election laws are made and executed in a State with reference to the education and property, or want of it, possessed by its citizens; so we must interpret the laws as to their intent (if that is important in the solution of this question), and especially, as here, when the intent attributed is proved by the practical result of the law's operation.

The fourteenth amendment was adopted with full knowledge of the illiteracy and poverty of colored and white persons in all the States, and of their political status and condition, also capacity and fitness to enjoy political rights and the necessity to possess them; in the light of all this the amendment must be interpreted.

But neither an educational nor property qualification, nor a poll tax, can be held to be other than disfranchising expedients. If the ability to read and write, or the ownership of $500 in value, or the payment of a $2 poll tax, could be a test free from a constitutional denial or abridgement of the citizen's right to vote, then the requirement might be that he should be able to read and write Greek, Hebrew, Sanscrit, and Latin and work all the propositions in Playfair's Euclid, or that he should own $100,000 in value of property, or should pay as a condition of voting a poll tax of $1,000 or more, or meet all three requirements combined, or others even more severe. What manner of autocracy or plutocracy would this establish? Would we still have a republic based on individual sovereignty? Who would say this would not deny or abridge the right to vote even in the most favored parts?

If inability to read and write, to possess $500 in value in property, or to pay $2 poll tax, or other like requirement, necessarily operates to prevent large numbers of citizens of a State from voting, is not the denial or abridgment as complete as it could be under any other requirment? It is therefore proper to say that anything that operates to deprive a natural voter of his right to vote is a denial or abridgment of such right.

Taking conditions into consideration the educational or property qualifications required are such that they can not possibly be complied with by large numbers of natural voting citizens. This was well understood when the requirements were made, and this impossibility was then well known to the State and its authorities. It follows that it was intended to be a denial or abridgment of the right to vote. No respectable authority goes so far as to say that an educational or property qualification or a poll tax that works disfranchisement in fact does not abridge the right to vote, within the meaning of the Constitution. The important thing is the denial or abridgment of the right to vote, not the manner of doing it.

The plea that the fault is not with the constitutions and laws of the States, but with the ignorance and poverty of the negroes and poor whites, hardly deserves attention. It is too soon after slavery to charge disfranchisement by the State on its ignorant and poor; that the disfranchised and not the State are to blame, and therefore other States and their citizens should not be allowed to complain of political inequality or have the Constitution enforced. The people constitute the State, and it, in an organized capacity, is amenable for the people's conduct and shortcomings regardless of their condition.

It is further claimed that as any State, subject only to the limitation fixed by the fifteenth amendment, may regulate the suffrage of citizens residing therein, the remedy against inequality of voting power is for each State to deny and abridge the suffrage to an extent great enough to produce political equality; that is, for all the States to vie with each other in denying or abridging the right to vote. In doing this the Hebrew, the German (as was attempted recently in Maryland), the Irishman, and those of other nationality or nativity, and the poor, are, of course, to be the victims. There are not enough colored citizens for this universal political slaughter.

The suggestion may be safely made that no candidate of any party will go, or will ever dare go, on the stump in any Congressional district in any State where suffrage is free and advocate the right or policy of a voter in other districts or States to continue to exercise two or more times as much Federal power as the voters of his own district. No matter what the previous politics of the district has been, the candidate who would do this would be beaten. The time is near at hand when in no district thus situate a candidate of any party can be elected who does not advocate equalization of representation between the States on the rule of the Constitution.

It is inconceivable that any man of any party would dare expect public support who claims his constituency is not equal in capacity and political right to that of any other district in any State. When the time comes that statesmen can successfully claim a voter in one part of the Union is superior in right to a voter in other parts, the end is near.

There is no party in this country which will ever dare declare in its platforms that it believes that voters in some sections or States of the Union ought to enjoy (as they now do) undue voting power. A party with such platforms would be without supporters.

Instead of meeting the question fairly, the Democratic party, which has always boasted that it stood for the common people and their natural rights, raise the false cry that to reduce representation as the Constitution provides would be sectional, raise the race question, promote social equality, lead to negro domination, penalize the disfranchising States, bring about negro suffrage, etc. Some few say those who seek to enforce the Constitution are prompted to it because they desire to keep up old war issues and to wave the "bloody shirt," and because they love the negro better than white people, and because people South vote the Democratic ticket, just as though, if these things were not also false, it would afford any excuse for not enforcing the Constitution, especially that part resting on principles of justice and designed to secure equality of citizenship. If there be partisan Democrats North or South who favor perpetuating the iniquitous political inequality between different sections of the Union to promote party success, the people will soon cease to support them. The good sense of the people will little longer be misled by false cries or false issues, raised to induce them to surrender their just share of political power.

To demand equal political rights for our own constituents raises no race question, does not promote social equality, does not tend to promote negro domination, does not punish disfranchising States, does not stir up war or sectional animosities, or raise the cry of "bloody shirt," or show love for the negro race above the white race, nor that the motive is to punish any State because it permits an elect few to vote the Democratic ticket only. Putting these and other like things forward, which no sane man of ordinary capacity believes true, is a confession that there is no way of fairly meeting the real question.

If the honest enforcement of the Constitution will tend to an enlarged suffrage it will be because the States may prefer to allow its white and colored now disfranchised citizens to vote rather than lose representation in Congress or the electoral college; that is, would prefer to have their own citizens vote if a select few are not permitted to vote for them and have representation based on them.

The latest claim is that the Constitution should not be enforced, though suffrage is denied because these States have only been engaged in "reforming the suffrage." Denying or abridging suffrage as a means of reforming it is, as has already been shown, undemocratic, against the principles on which our Republic was founded, autocratic and monarchial in tendency, but to superadd the right of the few to vote for the disfranchised, ignoring the universal equality of citizenship in the Union of the States, is to establish caste or class distinctions therein not justified on any principle, and which, continuing, will inevitably result in the overthrow of free government. To disfranchise citizens and then exercise all political power over or for them is to allow those not disfranchised a power, even within the State, repugnant to democratic institutions, and to extend such power over citizens of other States creates an oligarchy in the most objectionable form.

In some States peonage of the working man, regardless of race, has already arisen.

Maryland recently tried to inaugurate a scheme of disfranchisement applicable to white and colored alike, but her people called a halt. This nation is awakening to the danger impending, and its people will demand the enforcement of the Constitution and the preservation of their political rights. Political slavery will cease to exist.

It was once believed that in time certain States would so regulate suffrage as to avoid the necessity for enforcing the Constitution relating to representation in Congress, but instead State constitutions and laws have been made and so administered as to, from year to year, deny or abridge suffrage. The future promises no change.

That the South has some good laws, has established schools, and is now prospering is the slogan of some interested persons who desire to continue the unequal Federal voting power. What a plea for even a bad cause! As a premium to certain States and their elect few for not making all vicious laws, for not prohibiting common schools, and for availing themselves of sensible business methods or taking advantage of the general commercial prosperity of the country and for embracing conditions incident to freedom instead of clinging to effete ones of slavery times, it is claimed they should have the right to deny or abridge suffrage, and then, in national affairs, to vote for the disfranchised and enjoy a political power not enjoyed by citizens of other States. Has it come to this, that because certain citizens are not wholly bad they should be made superior to others who go not astray? Other States and their people have long had good laws, good public schools, and have enjoyed prosperity, and they ask no political supremacy, but seek their reward in the consciousness of having done right, and in the consequent good they derive therefrom. Such an excuse for violating the Constitution and usurping undue political power was never before advanced. In the business centers in the South, where there is great prosperity, sound commercial methods and money were imported. So of any general prosperity throughout the South.

In politics and political methods alone the disfranchising States have not advanced. History will show that lawlessness has grown rapidly in regions where election frauds and crimes exist and political rights have been withheld. There criminals are bred and thrown upon society elsewhere. Says one, What will the member from Ohio say on the subject of riots in his own city? I have no defense for lawlessness there or anywhere. There was no race or political war there, or nothing approaching it. The authorities, civil and military, protected the guilty negroes after their arrest, but the bawdy house, where they were harbored, was destroyed. Those caught in the lawless acts were put in prison, and, on trial, convicted and punished by jury and the courts. Can others say so much? The colored people there are, in general, peaceful citizens, with their own churches and Young Men's Christian Association. They send their children to the public schools, and are allowed to work side by side with white citizens in the factories and elsewhere. They sit on the juries with them without question. Neither Democrats nor Republicans assail them on account of their race or color, either in business or politics. Both parties defend and uphold them in the enjoyment of their political and other rights. Colored men guilty of crime are subject to the same condemnation as white men, no more, no less.

But is it not far from a satisfactory reason for not enforcing the Constitution of the United States to say, if even true, that one of the thousands who asks its enforcement resides in a city where a riot occurred?

FOURTEENTH NOT SUPERSEDED BY THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The claim that the fifteenth amendment supplanted the fourteenth needs only brief notice. The necessity for and language to be used in the fifteenth amendment was under consideration when the fourteenth was framed. One or more of the States ratified the fourteenth after the fifteenth had become part of the Constitution. The two are not inconsistent. The former, among other things (sec. 1), defined citizenship in the United States, and provided that no State should make or enforce any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to persons within it the equal protection of the laws; then followed (sec. 2) with the rule of apportionment based on numbers with the provision for reduction of representation, each and all relating to white and colored alike. It would be just as reasonable to contend that the fifteenth took away citizenship as defined in the fourteenth, revoked the inhibition against the right of a State to abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens, or its right to deprive persons of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or to deny to persons the equal protection of the laws, as to contend that it took away the power of Congress to reduce representation.

The fourteenth amendment defined citizenship because it had never before been defined in the Constitution, and the Dred Scott case (19 How., U. S., 393) held negroes were not citizens. All the parts of the fourteenth applied to and for the benefit of both white and colored people. The fifteenth was adopted for the sole purpose of prohibiting a State from denying the right of citizens to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," but it otherwise left to the States the same right they before enjoyed to regulate suffrage. This amendment also applied to all races. If it had not been so intended, color or previous condition of servitude would have only been mentioned.

It is as important in equalizing voting power among States and districts, as we have seen, that reduction of representation should be made regardless of who are denied suffrage. The fifteenth amendment left the right to regulate suffrage with the States, as though it had not been adopted, save the limitation on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and they have so regarded this right. The sequel has proved abundantly the necessity of the requirement for reduction of representation to equalize Federal voting power and that disfranchisement has gone on notwithstanding the fifteenth amendment, which "does not confer the right of suffrage." (92 S. S. 214, 542.) Nothing in its language justifies the claim that it was intended to repeal the earlier amendment. Repeals by implication never arise save when a later is plainly inconsistent with an earlier enactment. Here there is no inconsistency at all. Repeals by implication are not favored when legislative enactments are involved, and never when constitutional provisions are involved, save when one can not be enforced without plainly conflicting with another. Constitutions are made more deliberately, as a rule, than statute laws. Constitutions, as well as statutes, are required to be construed to avoid, if possible, repugnancy, and so as to give effect to all their provisions. (Potter's Dwarris, 145.)

Those who framed both amendments did not dream of their conflicting, on the contrary, regarded them as in perfect harmony, as we have seen and shall see.

The history of the amendments is instructive. Each is an evolution. The "Ohio idea" was first advanced, providing that negroes should be counted in making up representation only in States where they were permitted to vote. Then came Mr. Stevens's plan to base it on legal voters alone. Then followed Mr. Conkling's plan to apportion Representatives among States according to number, with the proviso:

That whenever in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

This being referred to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, was reported back in a new form, but in substance the same; it passed the House, but, after many attempts so to amend it as to also incorporate what is now the fifteenth amendment, prohibiting disfranchisement on account of race or color, etc., it was altered and passed by both Houses in its present form, the conclusion being then reached, Southern Members aiding, to vest Congress with power to reduce representation where the right to vote was denied or in any way abridged for any cause, whether in consequence of an educational or property qualification, or on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. There was almost a general agreement that if inequality in voting power arose between States, Congress should have the power to adjust it.

If we keep steadily in view that the central principle embodied in the second section of the fourteenth amendment was to secure, as nearly as possible in human affairs, universal equal political power, as exercised through the elective franchise in the several States of the Union, we will avoid technical theories.

If the fifteenth amendment had prohibited an educational test or a property qualification of a voter, it would have as much effected the fourteenth as it does in its present form.

The three war amendments were proclaimed and ratified in the order of their numbers, December 18, 1865, July 28, 1868, and March 30, 1870. (Virginia ratified the fourteenth after the fifteenth had been submitted.) And substantially the same Senators and Representatives, after the fifteenth amendment was ratified, gave their understanding of the continuing existence of the fourteenth by passing a law, never repealed, dated February 2, 1872 (now section 22, R. S. U. S.), embodying the language of section 2.

When the fifteenth amendment was adopted and ratified, the necessity and importance of the rule of equalizing the political power of the States and of the voters thereof were great and well understood, and they are now still more apparent than then.

Time and again our Supreme Court has recognized the fourteenth without a suggestion that it had been in any part superseded by the fifteenth. (92 U. S., 542; 100 U. S., 313, 339, 345–9; 103 U. S., 389; 170 U. S., 213, and 118 U. S., 356.)

Justice Strong, speaking for the court, uses this language:

But the Constitution now expressly gives authority for Congressional interference and compulsion in the cases embraced within the fourteenth amendment.

He says further, in speaking of this amendment:

It is these which Congress is empowered to enforce, and to enforce against State action however put forth. Whether that action be executive, legislative, or judicial, such enforcement is no invasion of State sovereignty. No law can be which the people of the States have by the Constitution of the United States empowered Congress to enact. (100 U. S., 246, 248.)

So, to enforce the Constitution is not sectional.

REDUCTION NOT A JUDICIAL FUNCTION.

It is also claimed that notwithstanding section 5 of the fourteenth amendment empowers Congress "to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article" it is without power to act, because in so acting it would exercise a "judicial function" wholly vested in the Supreme Court and other courts of the United States. (Constitution, Art. III, sec. 1.) No conflict of power between Congress and the courts can possibly arise. Whatever power is imposed on Congress includes the right to find whatever facts are requisite to its enforcement and in doing this it exercises a legislative and not a judicial function.

If a constitutional provision requires Congress to do anything requisite to its enforcement, the fact that another tribunal is usually charged by the same instrument with the power to do the same or a like thing does not take away the constitutional duty or right of Congress to act. The President is very frequently required, both by the Constitution and the laws, to find facts precedent to executive action, and, when found, there can be no review, either as to his finding or as to the action he has based thereon. So, as to the exercise of the legislative powers of Congress, which are plainly vested in it by the Constitution. If it were true, as claimed, that all judicial power was vested in the courts by one section of the Constitution, it is equally true that another and later one gives Congress the exclusive right to do whatever is necessary, whether judicial in its nature or not, to enforce the fourteenth amendment.

What is meant by the "judicial power of the United States" need not be discussed here; it is enough to know that it does not include any Congressional power. That there are difficulties in the way of exercising a power is no argument against its existence. Congress, when it submitted, and the States, when they ratified, the amendment, understood the difficulties in the way of its execution; yet the anticipated necessity for a remedy to preserve the underlying principle of equality among the sovereign people of the States was so great that they enjoined the important duty on Congress alone.

On this question our courts have spoken.

Congress, by virtue of the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment, may enforce the prohibitions whenever they are disregarded by either the legislative, the executive, or the judicial department of the State. (100 U. S., 313, syllabi.)

In the same report (p. 345), answering talk about judicial power in the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, and referring to the power granted to Congress by the fifth section thereof, and like sections to the other amendments, the court says:

All of the amendments derive much of their force from this latter provision. It is not said the judicial power of the General Government shall extend to enforcing the prohibitions and to protect the rights and immunities guaranteed. * * * It is the power of Congress that has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the provision by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective. Whatever legislation is appropriate * * * is brought within the domain of political power.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

Some inequality arises out of apportionment by Congress to the States, and in the formation by the States of districts of unequal population, but in neither case is disfranchisement involved. Congress and State legislatures are presumed to act reasonably, thereby avoiding as far as possible any such inequality. Washington regarded the first apportionment act passed by Congress so inequitable as to require him to veto it, and thus came about, under the advice of Jefferson, Randolph, and Madison, the first veto message (April 5, 1792) under the Constitution. (Elliot's Debates, etc., vol. 4, p. 624.) This shows, that from the beginning, equality of representation was regarded as of primary importance.

The impious doctrine of the Old World was that the people were made for the kings; it is none the less impious when some of the people are regarded as made for a self-chosen few who usurp their rights, and asume to exercise them unequally against others as well.

The work of disfranchising is not so elevating in character as to ennoble those engaged in it, and to give them increased governmental Federal power.

That all political power is derived from the consent of the governed has always been the battle-cry of true Jeffersonian Democracy. What is to be said when the voice of the governed is stilled, and those who brought this state of things about assume for themselves more than their natural or equal political power in the Union?

The common cry now is, that through trusts, insurance frauds, unjust transportation rates, and the like, the people are being robbed of their estates. What is left but to rob them of their equal political sovereignty?

Time, more than sufficient, has elapsed to demonstrate that those who arrogate to themselves the right to judge who of the white and colored citizens should or should not vote intend to deny or abridge suffrage to the extreme limit. This calls for the application of the remedy the Constitution wisely provides. This remedy, it is sincerely believed, will not only be in the interest of the States that have not entered upon the work of disfranchising, but will prove to be in the interest of all the States of the Union.

The Democratic party in recent national convention seemed to declare, in good faith, for "equality before the law of all citizens." Why not favor equality "of all citizens" in making the law?

That party then declared: "We deny the right of the Executive to disregard or suspend any constitutional privilege or limitation." Why not deny the right of Congress "to disregard or suspend any constitutional privilege or limitation?"

It also, then, was in favor of guaranteeing to our citizens when abroad, "native-born or naturalized, and without distinction of race or creed, the equal protection of the laws and the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges open to them under the covenant of our treaties." Why not guarantee to them the same equal rights in the United States?

It also demanded equal rights and self-government for the 6,961,339 Filipinos halfway around the world, which met with a concurring response by its late standard bearer (Mr. Parker), who, in his acceptance speech, asked in addition to have guaranteed to them the rights and privileges of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. Why not guarantee to 85,000,000 of our citizens in the States the same equal political and constitutional rights?

I am not now hoping for or expecting absolute equality in representation in our Government, but only such approach to it as may reasonably be attained, taking all the complicated conditions into account. My bill may not be perfect in that it does not even go to the danger line of doing injustice to any State or its people. The Representatives provided for by the bill will each be elected with a much less vote than was cast in 1904 in any State not named, Nevada excepted, and generally with less than one-half such vote. But of paramount importance is the recognition of the principle of equality in representation and among the voters of the Republic.

This Hall is the only place where the people in a representative capacity may be heard. The President and Vice-President are not chosen directly by the people. In twenty-one elections from and including 1824 (first year the vote was recorded) ten times a President has been chosen who had only a minority popular vote—Adams, 1824; Polk, 1844; Taylor, 1848; Buchanan, 1856; Lincoln, 1860; Hayes, 1876; Garfield, 1880; Cleveland, 1884 and 1892, and Harrison in 1888.

The Senate is based on a theory of equality in statehood.

If we maintain inequality in electing Members of this House, we shall have nothing left of true republicanism.

Daily this House rings with vehement speech about equalizing salaries of clerks and employees, especially those of old soldiers who long since furled their war flags and are now toiling—some of them with broken bodies—to earn their bread by the sweat of their furrowed and battle-scarred faces. Why not also equalize representation here and in the electoral college, as the Constitution enjoins us?

Regardless of misrepresentations and personal abuse (prompted partly by ignorance and partly by interest), I shall try to do my duty uninfluenced by them. I have the kindliest feeling for my southern fellow-citizens. I have been received by them with great kindness. I commanded in the recent war with Spain many volunteer military organizations of Southern States. I bear witness to the true spirit of patriotism and devotion to duty, to the restored Union, and to the flag, of the gallant men belonging to them. They, if the occasion had come, would have shown as great heroism as was ever shown by any men summoned to battle, and in achievement would have done honor to the brave men from whose loins they sprung. For the old Confederate soldier I have no feeling but of sympathy, respect, and kindness. No hatred or ill-will rankles in my breast toward the South. Both North and South have paid in blood, tears, and treasure the full penalty for the entailed crime of the ages—slavery. In getting rid of one dire evil, let us not nurse into life another one fraught with equal danger to the Republic.

It is suggested that because there is woman suffrage in some of the States and because some States permit persons not citizens to vote that the constitutional rule of reduction would work unequally. This can not be true, as the rule of reduction is based alone on the denial or abridgment of the right to vote of "male inhabitants * * * 21 years of age, citizens of the United States." Difficulties encountered in exercising a power do not warrant a refusal to exercise it.

It is too much to expect that in one speech all the groundless objections to Congress, or its Members, performing their constitutional duty, can be noticed.

It is wholly foreign to the question of equality of suffrage, through which, alone, equality of American citizenship can be secured and a republican form of government in States maintained, to complain of reconstruction after the civil war; or to say that the right of suffrage was originally left to be regulated by the States; or to say that they still possess that right; or to say that the disfranchising States are now only "reforming the suffrage;" or to say that in some of such States there have been schoolhouses built "upon every hill;" that population is increasing; that illiteracy has declined; that the mileage of railroads has increased; that cotton mills have sprung up, or that banking capital has increased largely, etc. These facts testify of prosperity which could not be attained while slavery existed in the South. They testify to the improved economic conditions of freedom, and do not prove that a voter in one section should have political power not possessed by a voter in other sections of our Union. Nor is it necessary for us to discuss here whether or not the fourteenth amendment "prohibits a just and fair regulation of suffrage." Nobody claims it does; but, when regulated, the amendment forbids those who are to enjoy it from voting for and having representation based on those regarded unfit to exercise the elective franchise. If unfit, this amendment regards them unfit to be counted in apportioning representation in Congress and in the electoral college, and denies those who, by reason of their assumed superior qualifications, do vote the right, in effect, to vote for the disfranchised, thereby gathering to themselves a political power not possessed by voters in States that do not believe that depriving the masses of citizens of the right to freely vote and to have their votes counted is to "reform the suffrage."

I plead for the sacredness of the Constitution and for the enforcement of all its provisions; for that first written charter of national freedom, born amid the throes of kingdoms and empires, to plant, preserve, and perpetuate civil and religious liberty in the world, and designed as a shield for the oppressed and persecuted. It came only after the flames had died out in the crater of a war waged for the equality of man before the law; its price was the blood and treasure of the patriots of the Revolution. It is also the more sacred by reason of the blood spilled and treasure expended in more recent wars for humanity to save it; equality of rights was its central principle. It was made by and for the people. Its preamble reads:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

A perfect union can not be formed, nor justice established, domestic tranquillity insured, common defense provided for, general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity secured by establishing and maintaining an inequality in political power by allowing a few in one State, regardless of conditions or methods, to exercise the elective franchise given to the many in other States of the Union. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The committee will informally rise to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MAHON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 97. Joint resolution authorizing assignment of pay of teachers and other employees of the Bureau of Education in Alaska; and

H. R. 15649. An act extending the time for the construction of the dam across the Mississippi River authorized by the act of Congress approved March 12, 1904.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10129) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. CULBERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4969. An act granting permission to Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, United States Navy, to accept a silver cup and salver and a silver punch bowl and cups tendered to him by the British and Russian ambassadors, respectively, in the name of their Governments; and

S. 3401. An act for the relief of the executors of the estate of Harold Brown, deceased.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is the first time I have ever done it, and I hate very much to do it now, but there is but little more than an hour until the House is going to adjourn, and I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. KEIFER. It is the first time that objection has been made, that I know of. I only want about twenty minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no doubt the gentleman could get through in that time, but there is only an hour left, and the gentleman from Virginia wants ten minutes and that will only leave fifty minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. There will be plenty of time after 3 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After that time you can get in. I will be compelled to object.

Mr. KEIFER. I will give notice that the time for unanimous consent has about ceased in this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should be very sorry, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman should take that view.

Mr. KEIFER. I must take it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have explained the matter to the gentleman. The gentleman from Virginia needs time and I need time, and we are going to get about fifty minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has spoken once on this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to make a speech. I only want to give some advice to the Republican caucus, and if I do not give it to-day it will be too late.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has frequently been giving advice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will myself ask to-morrow that the gentleman may conclude his remarks, but I can not do so now.

Mr. KEIFER. Of course I have to yield to the objection. I would have concluded in about fifteen minutes more if I had the time. The gentleman knows that it is much better for me if I could close now and have it altogether, if it is possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, but it is absolutely necessary that we should get in what we have to say now, and I therefore object. I will be very glad to hear the gentleman conclude his remarks to-morrow. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the pending measure. On the contrary, I desire to devote the very few moments yielded me to some brief comment upon the subject of the message of the President of the United States, which has just been read to the House. I regret exceedingly that my time is too limited to permit a thorough discussion of so important a paper. I think I am not mistaken in saying that the cablegram of a day or two ago announcing the massacre by American soldiers of 600 Moros, many of whom were women and children, in the crater at the top of Mount Dajo, on the island of Jolo, shocked the humane and moral sensibilities of every right-thinking American citizen. Making every allowance possible on account of the intimate personal relations which exist between the President and General Wood—the known partiality of President Roosevelt for General Wood—I am still utterly at a loss to understand how the Chief Executive of this great and free Republic could find it in his heart to place his high official approval upon conduct as cruel and as inhuman as that which characterized the atrocities of the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands. A few years ago, when General Smith, known to fame as "Hell Roaring Jake Smith," issued his infamous order that all natives in the island of Samar over the age of 10 years should be treated as belligerents and shot down, the people of every civilized country were horribly shocked; but that abhorrent order, Mr. Chairman, in my estimation, is not to be compared to the massacre of innocents which the crater at the summit of Mount Dajo witnessed, and for which the commanding officer of our forces in the Philippines assumes the responsibility and seeks in this cablegram to justify. In defense of Smith it was urged by his friends that his cruel order was never put into execution, nor intended to be.

Mr. Chairman, the conduct of those who engaged in the slaughter of these women and children, and of those who may be responsible therefor, may receive official indorsement and even commendation, but it will never meet the approval of the American people unless I am woefully mistaken as to what should constitute honorable warfare. I do not believe, in the first place, that the attack made upon Moros who had taken refuge in an almost inaccessible position on a mountain top can be justified. It may have been spectacular; but it certainly showed an amazing disregard of the lives of the men who were ordered to make the assault. According to my information Mount Dajo is not only very difficult of ascent, but it stands apart and alone, and therefore could easily have been surrounded. It would have taken but a short time to have starved out and captured every man of them without the sacrifice of a single American life. But, be that as it may, the hideous fact stands out in bold relief that 600 Moros were killed as against 15 of the attacking forces, and General Wood is driven to admit that among the Moro dead there were many women and children. Not the life of a single miserable woman, nor one of a pitiful innocent child was spared! The whole tribe was exterminated. Does the world's history afford a parallel to this case?

But General Wood, who it seems did not make the ascent of the mountain until the butchery had been ended for the very lack of more victims, tells us that he is convinced there was "no man, woman, or child wantonly killed"—they were all, he says, "unavoidably" killed. The women were killed because they wore trousers, and the children being used as shields by the men naturally suffered a like fate. Then to silence forever any carping critic at home he adds "they apparently desired that none be saved." This is probably the only side of this pitiful story that will ever be given the American people. The lips of every Moro are sealed in death, and we are asked to accept General Wood's statement that the women and children were killed simply because they did not desire to be saved. For one I decline to be satisfied with such an incredible story. Such a monstrous proposition is to my mind simply unbelieveable. And feeling as I do, I am not willing that a single day shall pass by without my registering my emphatic dissent to the conclusions to which the President tells us he has arrived. In my deliberate judgment the killing of 600 men, women, and children in the crater of Mount Dajo by the troops under command of General Wood was a wanton and cruel act of butchery, and one which can not be justified and which the American people will never excuse and never forget.

Mr. Chairman, the Washington Post of this morning contains an editorial which very correctly reflects my sentiments and feelings. It should be given the widest circulation. I ask leave to incorporate it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

A WAR FOR CIVILIZATION.

When civilization proceeds "to stagger humanity," it calls in Francisco Pizarro or "Hell-roaring Jake" Smith, Hernando Cortez or Leonard Wood, all experts at the business. It is an old trade. Ahab practiced it on Naboth, the Jezreelite, and the Lord wreaked vengeance on that same plat. The King ordered a Te Deum for Cortez's "victory;" the President congratulates Wood on his "victory."

We have always believed that the American people will put an end to the Philippine question whenever they shall be given a good lick at it unencumbered with any other political question. It is un-American, unrepublican, undemocratic—this thing of holding people in subjection on the other side of the planet. Our country has tolerated it; never approved it.

"Hell-roaring Jake" Smith shocked all Christendom when he made proclamation to kill everybody over 10 years old. If the question could have been made paramount at the succeeding election, we would have been out of the thing by this time. General Wood says the latest butchery of men and women was because they fought so fiercely; and yet they killed but 16 of his men, while he killed 600 of theirs.

The fact is that General Wood is civilizing the Moros on the idea that there are no good Moros but dead ones. That is the way Caius Marius performed when he was down in Jugurtha's country. Lucullus, Pompey the Great, Crassus, Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, and one hundred Cæsars acted on the same principle. We have not improved on it a particle. A Roman proconsul before the birth of Christ acted precisely as General Wood acts nearly two thousand years after Christ expired on the cross for Moro as well as for American.

There is no authority in the Constitution to shoot civilization into savages on the other hemisphere. If it must be done, there are empires and kingdoms over there that believe in it and are accustomed to it. Let them do it. If we can not govern the Moros without murdering women, better that we withdraw and let them govern themselves.

Evidently General Wood is a man after the order of Strafford, and believes in "Thorough." Neither Pizarro nor Cortez could have done it more signally than he. Indeed, General Wood gave us in the shambles what "Hell-roaring Jake" ordered in a proclamation.

The Post does not state the case one atom too strongly. Believe me, this discussion has but begun, and before it is ended I doubt not that even the President himself will conclude that it was a mistaken impulse which prompted his hasty and, as I believe, wholly unwarranted approval of what will go down into history as a wanton and indefensible slaughter of defenseless women and helpless children. Who can believe that there was necessity for this wholesale massacre of women and children? What reasonable human being can believe that the killing of these poor, ignorant creatures could not have been avoided? To me it is unthinkable that the Moros charged the assaulting American columns holding their children before them as shields. Such a story is too preposterous, too monstrous to find credence in any quarter. It will not be accepted by unprejudiced and dispassionate, humane, and Christian people anywhere. From one end of civilization to the other it will be repudiated—throughout the world it will be scornfully rejected.

Mr. Chairman, excuse it as we may, the revolting story of the massacre of Mount Dajo will go down into history as the blackest stain upon the American name. A thousand years of honorable, humane, noble, and Christian conduct on the part of our American soldiery will not suffice to blot out that stain. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I arose for another purpose, but the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] have suggested to me that I ought to read a little poem prepared by one of the Members of the House and handed to me not long ago. It is entitled "The Charge of the Wood Brigade," or what the heathen call "The Massacre of Mount Daio." It reads as follows:

THE CHARGE OF THE WOOD BRIGADE; OR WHAT THE HEATHEN CALL "THE MASSACRE OF MOUNT DAJO."

Chased them from everywhere,
Chased them all onward,
Into the crater of death
Drove them—six hundred!
"Forward the Wood brigade;
Spare not a one," he said;
"Shoot all six hundred!"

"Forward the Wood brigade!"
Was there a man afraid?
Not tho' a soldier knew
Heathen had blundered.
Savages can't reply,
Heathen can't reason why
Women and children die;
Forced in the crater of death,
Forced with six hundred.

Cannon to right of them,
Cannon to left of them,
Cannon in front of them,
Volleyed and thundered.
Stormed at with shot and shell,
Women and children fell
Into the jaws of death,
Into the mouth of hell,
All told, six hundred!

Flashed all the sabers there,
Flashed as they turned in air,
Sab'ring the women there,
Charging the children while
All the world wondered.
Stifled by cannon smoke,
Men, women, children choke;
Women and children
Reel'd from the bay'net stroke,
In death not sundered;
Families slaughtered there—
All of six hundred.

Cannon to right of them,
Cannon to left of them,
Cannon in front of them,
Volleyed and thundered.
Stormed at with shot and shell,
While child and mother fell,
They that had loved so well!
Thrust into jaws of death,
Trapped into mouth of hell,

What shall such blood thirst slake?
Go ask Hell Roaring Jake
Whether Wood blundered.
Honor the charge they made?
Honor the Wood brigade
For that six hundred?

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

I did not arise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose, however, of speaking about the battle on Mount Dajo. The party of restriction, the G. O. P., the Grand Old Procrastinator, is going to hold a caucus at 3 o'clock. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] This party of restriction, a party of restriction against products and men both, are going to hold a caucus "for the purpose of getting together." They restrict the membership of the caucus and do not permit me to participate in its deliberations. My only opportunity of impressing upon the Republican brethren of the House my advice and their only opportunity to hear advice of a safe and sane sort presents itself now. I was sorry a moment ago to make my first objection to unanimous consent for a Member to continue his remarks, but you will see that if I do not proceed now it will be too late to advise you tomorrow. Whatever errors you are going to commit will have been caucus committed by then, and my only hope is that you shall commit no error. That hope arises from the confident expectation that you will seriously consider the advice I am about to give you and will be guided to some extent by it.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I want to ask the gentleman if he has any desire to participate in this conference; and if so, if he should receive an invitation he would accept it and be bound by the action of the caucus?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will, provided that the invitation comes with the further addition and promise that after I get there I shall not be gagged. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Such is the habit of the Republican party——

Mr. MILLER. I can only speak for myself——

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). Such is the habit of the Republican party in gagging philosophy and principles and practice, especially in connection with statehood matters, that I am afraid that after I get there my friend Mr. HAMILTON would move that I go "way back and sit down" and be allowed to say nothing. But for that I would go to the caucus to advise you instead of instructing you here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that as far as I am personally concerned I would be glad to have him not only invited to the caucus, but take part in the proceedings, and I have every reason to believe that he would be bound by the action of that caucus, as he always is on all occasions in a caucus of his own.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A Republican caucus that I attend on my conditions, yes; a Democratic caucus always. Now, Mr. Chairman, to be serious, you gentlemen upon that side of the Chamber are confronted with a naked question which you can not avoid nor evade. The country knows what the question is, and you can not muddy the waters so as to fool the country about what it is. The naked question is, Shall the new State of Oklahoma, consisting of the Territories of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, be admitted to the Union or not? You can not muddy the waters by any parliamentary device. You can not muddy the waters by any caucus action. You can not muddy the waters by any rule proposed or adopted. A bill has gone from this House to the Senate to admit two States out of four Territories. Two of the Territories, Arizona and New Mexico, making one State, the new State of Arizona, have been stricken from the bill by the Senate. The Senate had its reasons. Were they good? Were they bad? I care not. What is practically left is this naked question: Shall or shall not Oklahoma be admitted? The naked proposition with which the House of Representatives is confronted is, Shall the bill as amended by the Senate, admitting Oklahoma to statehood, pass the House of Representatives or not? The American people know that in the new State of Oklahoma there are nearly 2,000,000 people, coming from every State in the American Union—South, East, North, and West—a magnificent homogeneous population, capable of self-government to the very utmost extent, a people rich in energy, rich in resources, rich in capabilities, rich in all that goes to make up American citizenship, with no trouble about assimilability, no race question presented between Mexicans speaking the Spanish language and Americans speaking the English language, as in the proposed new State of Arizona and New Mexico; with no question of two different populations with divergent ideas, divergent traditions and ideals; no questions of difference about religion or habits of thought as would confront us in the case of making one State of Arizona and New Mexico, but a homogeneous American people nearly 2,000,000 strong.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do for a question.

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] think the difference in language among the people in New Mexico an insuperable difficulty? If so, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the Swiss Republic as illustrative of how three nationalities have cooperated to make one of the most successful republics of all times, in which the German, Italian, and French languages are the national tongues.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that I will have to be cut off by this proposed Republican caucus or conference, and I yielded to the gentleman only for a question. I do not think that the difference of language alone would present an insuperable objection. It did not present one in Louisiana, it does not present one in the Swiss Republic, and it has not until lately presented one in Austria-Hungary outside of Hungary itself; but there is not only the difference of language, but of race, in the case of Arizona and New Mexico. Racial characteristics are inherent and inborn, and there is always, where you put two different races together, necessarily a race antagonism. I do not desire to discuss the merits of this question that has been fully invited by us in the House and evaded by you. I desire the country to understand what you are going into caucus about. You are going into caucus for two things—to determine, first, whether you will allow the House of Representatives to vote upon the Senate proposition or not, and, secondly, upon the proposition that I have just outlined, to wit, whether you will admit Oklahoma, regardless of whether Arizona and New Mexico are admitted or not. But the chief thing you are going into conference about is to determine whether you will allow this House to vote, whether you will allow yourselves to vote, upon a proposition to be made to this House—a motion to concur in the Senate amendment and admit or refuse statehood to Oklahoma as a naked proposition, stripped of entangling alliance.

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the gentleman not think that we ought to go into conference? Is not that a right that we should permit ourselves?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am not denying the right. I am trying to tell the country what you are going into caucus to do. That is all. You are going into caucus to know whether you can trust yourselves to handle yourselves or not. You are going into caucus to know whether it is safe as a Republican doctrine to leave the Members of the House of Representatives to determine this question—a House in which you have nearly a two-thirds majority—or whether it shall be determined by some rule from our triumvirate or by some parliamentary device exercised by the one-man power, the Speaker. I have heard a good deal about some parliamentary device which is to keep us from having a vote on this question—this question of admitting nearly two millions of people, who would be entitled to eight Representatives in this House; Representatives as intelligent as those from Connecticut, those from Illinois, or those from Mississippi. How will you stand before the country when you shall say, if you do, that these people, brim full of American energy and progress, shall be excluded from the American Union for at least this Congress longer, because, forsooth, two other Territories, with a different population, about whose qualifications for admission there have been arguments and doubts, can not come in? Most of the men who are standing on that side of the proposition are the men who have argued against the qualifications of Arizona and New Mexico to come into the Union, and now you are about to take the position that because these people in Arizona and New Mexico, about whose qualifications you have expressed doubts, can not come into the Union, that therefore these people in Oklahoma, about whose qualifications there is and has been expressed no doubt, also shall not come into the Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is worse than that. You not only take that position, but you take the position that because these two other Territories do not want to be coupled together in one State therefore you will not let Oklahoma come into the Union.

You deny Arizona and New Mexico the right to come in separately. You decree that they shall stay out or be coupled in statehood. They decline to be coupled. You say, "All right, then Oklahoma shall stay out." How long? Until Arizona and New Mexico consent to statehood marriage. Everybody has heard about some special Speaker's ruling, to the effect that this thing would have to go to committee, where, of course, it would be smothered. I am going to file a brief on the parliamentary situation as a part of my remarks. The authorities are clear that even though there be a Senate amendment upon a House bill (and I deny that there is any in this case), which makes an appropriation of money or property which requires the amendment to go to the Committee of the Whole House, and therefore sends it first to the standing committee, that if there be another amendment from the Senate which does not make any charge upon the Treasury either in money or in land, it is always open to move to concur in that particular amendment whether you move to concur in all the amendments or not.

Mr. HAMILTON rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not yield for awhile.

Mr. HAMILTON. I simply wanted to say that would not arise until——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather not be interrupted in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. HAMILTON. I started to say that would not arise until after the point of disagreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, that is one of the things this caucus will determine——

Mr. HAMILTON. No——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whether that course is to be pursued or not. That the Speaker of this House has power to send from his desk without consulting this House this Senate bill to your committee no man will question; that he has the right to do it I deny; and I will file a brief that shows he has not the right to do it. It was very carefully prepared by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] at my request and after consulting all the authorities from the beginning down to now.

Any Member of this House has the right, whether the Speaker has the power to cut him off from the right or not, to move to concur in the particular Senate amendment which cuts Arizona and New Mexico out of the bill, and to move to concur in that particular Senate amendment which requires a referendum to a vote of the people of Arizona and to a vote of the people of New Mexico to decide whether either chooses to come in jointly, even though that right may not exist as to that particular Senate amendment which provides for lieu lands already not granted, but given to be selected from. Not an acre is increased in land. There is not an additional charge upon the Treasury in money or land.

That amendment is merely a provision that in lieu of mining lands Oklahoma may select other lands. It does not make any additional appropriation either of money or land. It does not increase the amount of land one acre. It decreases the value of the land actually as a matter of fact. But even though it might be held that that particular amendment had to go to the committee because of the contention that it altered or changed an appropriation affecting lands, the same thing can not be held of these other two amendments. Now, everybody knows my personal affection for the Speaker of this House, and I am not ashamed of it either. He deserves my personal trust, regard, and affection, but I say with full knowledge of what I am saying now that if that course of sending this matter to committee without consulting the House is pursued it will be the most high-handed piece of political tyranny that ever took place from that Speaker's desk since the American Congress was organized. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And for that reason I do not believe it is going to take place. What is tyranny? It is one-man will—the one-man power checking the public will and thwarting the public power. Here is the entire United States which want Oklahoma admitted. Here is the entire Congress of the United States that wants Oklahoma admitted.

Right now, in order to demonstrate that fact, I am going to ask if there is a single man upon this floor who does not want Oklahoma admitted? If there be one, let him rise in his place. Is there one who does not want Oklahoma admitted? [A pause.] The entire body of the representatives of the people are here, and not one man rises, because there is not one who objects to the admission of Oklahoma, or who, if he objects, dares say so; and yet you are going to make a pretext out of the fact that Arizona and New Mexico have been cut out of this bill by the Senate to send this bill to the committee to be smothered, or to bring in a rule or to do something else to prevent—what? To prevent, first, the admission of Oklahoma, and, secondly and mainly, to prevent this House from having a vote upon the proposition whether this particular amendment from the Senate shall be concurred in; to prevent this House from voting on the naked proposition to admit or exclude Oklahoma. Are you going to vote to exclude Oklahoma? Directly or indirectly? Under a cover of caucus action? By the adoption of a rule? Under the cover of a parliamentary device? By not voting down any possible ruling of the Speaker contrary to express parliamentary law? Will you by caucus action bind your own hands and those of the House?

Now, the object of my conversation with you now is to persuade you not to do any of these things, gentlemen. If you do not do it, it will, of course, be because I have begged you not to do it, and argued with you not to do it. That will be the only reason why you will not do it, when you meet at 3 o'clock. It is necessary to talk to you now, because this will be my last opportunity; and I see looks of gratitude on the faces of many gentlemen on the other side for the advice that many of you now enjoy. [Laughter.] I see that the Speaker, even, is proud of the fact that I have left my side of the Chamber in a nonpartisan spirit to advise the other side of the Chamber to do justice and right, though the heavens fall.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman says he loves the Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Personally, not politically.

Mr. HAMILTON. As we all do. Has he ever known the Speaker of the House to deviate from the rules which govern the House of Representatives?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I believe I can answer that in the Speaker's own language, "Never except when political exigencies require it." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Have you ever known of such an exigency arising?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; seriously, I have not; and for that very reason I do not believe he is going to do it in this case, as I said a moment ago.

Now, then, I want to say a few words to some of you over there, although I am not your father confessor. You Republicans from Missouri vote to keep Oklahoma out of the Union simply because the Senate has cut out Arizona and New Mexico, and then go back to your people if you will or dare. The last thing that I respect in the world is a prophet. I am not one. But you know the condition of public sentiment in Missouri about the admission of Oklahoma. As a partisan, if I were actuated only by partisan motives, I should be glad to see you take this course, because it would result in a gain of Democratic Congressmen from the State of Missouri. You gentlemen from Kansas. You mark it. Stand here if you will and vote with your eyes open for any sort of a proposition, whether a rule or a parliamentary device, or the result of a caucus action, or what not, that cuts Oklahoma out of the Union, forsooth, because

New Mexico can not come in coupled with Arizona, that does not want to be married to her, and then go back, and see if perhaps the State of Kansas will not have a lucid interval about the time of the Congressional elections, and see if several Democratic Congressmen will not come here from Kansas, too, or if not, then other Republicans to succeed you.

The whole west of the river has its eyes on this matter, I sympathize with them, because nothing but a river, hardly, separates me from them. Everything west of the river has condemned and reprobated the idea of antagonism to the West that has been indicated by the Republican party all along the line in connection with this question in this House; in the first place, when it refused to make four States and insisted on making two. Why? Because it never wanted the West to have equal or adequate power in the Senate of the United States. The West will understand. Everybody west of the river will know that the Republican party, dominated by its northeastern forces, has been actuated by the idea to continue forever as far as possible the predominancy of the East in the United States Senate. And why should that be done? Away back many years ago somebody tried to scare old Thomas Jefferson with the suggestion that the growth of the West would result in the power of the States on the Atlantic seaboard sinking into insignificance. That farseeing seer, with a look of wisdom, made reply:

What of it? Who will the people of the West be? Our children, our grandchildren, and our great-grandchildren. Why should we be alarmed at the predominancy in the United States, in the Union, any more of our children, our grandchildren, or our great-grandchildren who have gone West, than of those of our children, our grandchildren, our great-grandchildren who have stayed East?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to embody in the RECORD, instead of boring the House by reading it, this brief of the parliamentary status of this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by the insertion of certain matter, which he sends to the Clerk's desk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE PARLIAMENTARY SITUATION AS TO THE STATEHOOD BILL IN THE HOUSE, WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS.

The Senate has amended the statehood bill admitting Oklahoma and Indian Territory to statehood as one State and Arizona and New Mexico as another State by striking out all of those provisions of the bill that related to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico and amending those provisions of the House bill that related to Oklahoma by providing for the substitution of certain lands in lieu of school lands already allowed by the House bill to be selected by the Territory of Oklahoma, but which can not be taken on account of their being mineral lands. The question raised is whether the bill with these amendments should be referred to the Committee on Territories by the Speaker or whether it is in order to move to take it from the Speaker's table and to concur in the amendments.

As to the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, Rule XXIV, section 2, provides:

"Business on the Speaker's table shall be disposed of as follows: Messages from the Senate shall be referred to the appropriate committees without debate; reports and communications from the heads of Departments and other communications addressed to the House and bills, resolutions, and messages from the Senate may be referred to the appropriate committees in the same manner, and with the same right of correction, as public bills presented by Members; but House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in the Committee of the Whole may be disposed of at once as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House and not required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole, be disposed of in the same manner on motion directed to be made by the committee."

Rule XX provides:

"That any amendments of the Senate of any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; if originating in the House, it would be subject to that point of order."

As to the business that it is necessary to consider in the Committee of the Whole House, Rule XXIII, section 3, provides:

"That all motions, or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people, all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, or referring any claim to the Court of Claims, shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of the bill has commenced."

There are two Senate amendments. As to the amendment of the Senate striking out all that portion of the House bill relating to Arizona and New Mexico, there can be no question that it does not come within the terms of Rule No. 23, as to matter that is required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House. It has been held in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress (RECORD, pages 5981 and 5985), "that the fact that one of several Senate amendments must be considered in the Committee of the Whole does not prevent the House from proceeding with the disposition of those not subject to the point of order;" but it has also been held in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress (RECORD, pages 4585 and 4586), "that Senate amendments referred to the Committee of the Whole must be considered, but not if not referred to the Committee of the Whole, although they may not be within the rule requiring such consideration." It is therefore of importance that we move to concur in the Senate amendment relating to Arizona and New Mexico before the bill is referred, as we no doubt will have a right to do under this ruling, for we can then have a vote in the House with a roll call on the main question, whereas, if the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole, there will be no opportunity to get a roll call on the main question—that is, the striking out of Arizona and New Mexico.

Now, as to the question as to whether the amendment providing for lieu lands in Oklahoma is within the terms of Rule 23, and required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole, there are two decisions that may be quoted as authorizing this reference, but I do not think that they apply. In the first session of the Fifty-first Congress (Journal, page 718; RECORD, page 5842), and the first session of the Fifty-second Congress (Journal, page 237), and the second session of the Fifty-third Congress (Journal, page 15; RECORD, page 36), it was held that the grant to a railroad of an easement of public lands or streets belonging to the United States requires to be considered in the Committee of the Whole. Again, in the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress (RECORD, pages 2215 and 2216), it was held "that the dedication of public lands to be forever used as a public park was held to be such an appropriation of public property as would come within the rule." (Rule 23.) These decisions clearly refer to a grant of property belonging to the United States and original grants, but are differentiated from the case under consideration, which does not make a grant, but merely provides as to the manner of selecting lands heretofore granted. In sustaining the proposition that this amendment does not have to be considered in the Committee of the Whole I find that it has been decided in the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress (Journal, page 782; RECORD, page 2203), that "A bill changing the manner of expenditure of money already appropriated does not require consideration in the Committee of the Whole." The amendment under consideration does not appropriate public lands or dispose of them, but merely changes the manner of selecting the land already allowed to be selected, and seems to me to be analogous to the above decision.

Again, it has been held in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress (RECORD, pages 8888, 8882, and 10690) and the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress (RECORD, page 2455) that "legislation providing for the adjustment of liabilities to or by the Government, except references to the Court of Claims, does not come under the rule requiring consideration in the Committee of the Whole." It seems to me that this decision is also clearly in point, as the amendments above referred to do not make an original grant, but provide for the adjustment or mode of selecting lands that have heretofore been allowed to be selected by the Government. In other words, it is an adjustment of the liabilities of the Government.

Again, it has been held in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress (RECORD, page 2165) that "A bill simply granting a right of way through public lands was held not to be subject to the point of order; that it must be considered in the Committee of the Whole." Again, a case somewhat in point was decided at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress (RECORD, page 8483), that "Land belonging to the Indians, having been sold by the Government for the Indians, a bill extending the time of payment by purchasers and authorizing them to purchase additional lands of the same kind are held not to be within the rule requiring consideration in the Committee of the Whole."

As to the priority of motions, it seems to me that at this stage of the proceedings a motion made in the House to refer the Senate amendments to the Committee on Territories would have precedence of a motion to concur, but if the motion to refer was voted down, then it would be in order to vote on the motion to concur. In the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress (RECORD, pages 839 and 840) it was held that "before the stage of disagreement has been reached, a motion to refer Senate amendments has precedence of a motion to concur."

Another question may arise, and that is, if the Speaker determines to refer the Senate amendments with the bill to the Committee on Territories of his own motion and without submitting the question to the House as to what is the best way to raise the question in the House. It has been held in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress (Journal, pages 758, 767, 770, 772, and RECORD, pages 62081, 63014, 63053, 63054, and 63064) that "A House bill with Senate amendments having been properly referred from the Speaker's table, it was decided, nevertheless, to be in order for the House to consider an amendment to the Journal striking out the record of such reference." Of course if it is in order to strike out the reference to a bill properly referred, it would be in order to strike out the reference to a bill improperly referred, and if the record is stricken out of the Journal, so far as the House is concerned, the bill would be on the Speaker's table subject to the action of the House.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the official reporters to put in asterisks right here, because I am going to enter upon another subject. The other day while speaking to the House about a bill which I had introduced, to reduce duties, wherever they were over 100 per cent, to 100 per cent, I explained that I could not then find a paper which I wanted. I furnished some of the illustrations of duties over 100 per cent from actual bills that had come in—actual importations—and furnished some other instances from a magazine. I now have the thing that I wanted to get the other day. It is from the Department of Commerce and Labor, Bureau of Statistics, "Quantities and Values of Imported Merchandise entered for Consumption in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1905," prepared by Mr. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau. I need not tell you that he is a sort of Republican statistician. Outside of tobacco and spirituous liquors I find fifty-seven cases of duties above 100 per cent. I have not used any cases of tariff on tobaccos and spirituous liquors, for nearly all of them are above 100 per cent. I have not thought it fair to use them, because they have been levied partially for the purpose of countervailing an internal-revenue tax, and of course there ought to be a tariff equal to and somewhat above the internal-revenue tax. But outside of tobacco and spirituous liquors there are fifty-seven other articles. I did not quote the other day from the wool schedule. There are illustrations from the wool schedule, the carpet schedule, and various others. If the House will permit me, instead of reading these various illustrations I will hand them to the official reporters in order that they may be incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, how much of the book which the gentleman has before him does he intend to publish?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Fifty-seven rates of duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

The statistics referred to are as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-three minutes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Official Reporters to put in another row of asterisks here, because this is another speech. I am making three speeches in one. Some gentlemen say four. The twenty-three minutes which I have will be sufficient to have the Clerk read for the edification of the House a little drama. For the explanation of Members I will say that wherever the word "octroi" is used it means the customs duty paid at the gate of a city. This is a nice little drama especially designed for the reading of protectionists, and is by Mr. Bastiat, the gentleman whose petition I presented to the House yesterday. I will ask the Clerk to read the parts indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

The three aldermen: A demonstration in four tableaux.

FIRST TABLEAU.

(The scene is in the hotel of Alderman Pierre. The window looks out on a fine park; three persons are seated near a good fire.)

PIERRE. Upon my word, a fire is very comfortable when the stomach is satisfied. It must be agreed that it is a pleasant thing. But, alas! how many worthy people, like the King of Yvetot,

"Blow on their fingers for want of wood."

Unhappy creatures, Heaven inspires me with a charitable thought. You see these fine trees. I will cut them down and distribute the wood among the poor.

PAUL and JEAN. What! Gratis?

PIERRE. Not exactly. There would soon be an end of my good works if I scattered my property thus. I thing that my park is worth 20,000 livres; by cutting it down I shall get much more for it.

PAUL. A mistake. Your wood as it stands is worth more than that in the neighboring forests, for it renders services which that can not give. When cut down, it will, like that, be good for burning only, and will not be worth a sou more per cord.

PIERRE. Oh, Mr. Theorist, you forget that I am a practical man. I supposed that my reputation as a speculator was well enough established to put me above any charge of stupidity. Do you think that I shall amuse myself by selling my wood at the price of other wood?

PAUL. You must.

PIERRE. Simpleton! Suppose I prevent the bringing of any wood to Paris!

PAUL. That will alter the case. But how will you manage it?

PIERRE. This is the whole secret. You know that wood pays an entrance duty of 10 sous per cord. To-morrow I will induce the aldermen to raise this duty to 100, 200, or 300 livres, so high as to keep out every fagot. Well, do you see? If the good people do not want to die of cold, they must come to my wood yard. They will fight for my wood. I shall sell it for its weight in gold, and this well-regulated deed of charity will enable me to do others of the same sort.

PAUL. This is a fine idea, and it suggests an equally good one to me.

JEAN. Well, what is it?

PAUL. How do you find this Normandy butter?

JEAN. Excellent.

PAUL. Well, it seemed passable a moment ago. But do you not think it is a little strong? I want to make a better article at Paris. I will have four or five hundred cows, and I will distribute milk, butter, and cheese to the poor people.

PIERRE and JEAN. What, as a charity?

PAUL. Bah! Let us always put charity in the foreground. It is such a fine thing that its counterfeit is an excellent card. I will give my butter to the people and they will give me their money. Is that called selling?

JEAN. No; according to the bourgeois gentilhomme; but call it what you please, you ruin yourself. Can Paris compete with Normandy in raising cows?

PAUL. I shall save the cost of transportation.

JEAN. Very well; but the Normans are able to beat the Parisians, even if they do have to pay for transportation.

PAUL. Do you call it beating anyone to furnish him things at a low price?

JEAN. It is the time-honored word. You will always be beaten.

PAUL. Yes; like Don Quixote. The blows will fall on Sancho. Jean, my friend, you forgot the octroi.

JEAN. The octroi! What has that to do with your butter?

PAUL. To-morrow I will demand protection, and I will induce the council to prohibit the butter of Normandy and Brittany. The people must do without butter, or buy mine, and that at my price, too!

JEAN. Gentlemen, your philanthrophy carries me along with it. "In time one learns to howl with the wolves." It shall not be said that I am an unworthy alderman. Pierre, this sparkling fire has illumined your soul; Paul, this butter has given an impulse to your understanding, and I perceive that this piece of salt pork stimulates my intelligence. To-morrow I will vote myself, and make others vote, for the exclusion of hogs, dead or alive; this done I will build superb stock yards in the middle of Paris "for the unclean animal forbidden to the Hebrews." I will become swineherd and pork seller, and we shall see how the good people of Paris can help getting their food at my shop.

PIERRE. Gently, my friends; if you thus run up the price of butter and salt meat, you diminish the profit which I expected from my wood.

PAUL. Nor is my speculation so wonderful, if you ruin me with your fuel and your hams.

JEAN. What shall I gain by making you pay an extra price for my sausages, if you overcharge me for pastry and fagots?

PIERRE. Do you not see that we are getting into a quarrel? Let us rather unite. Let us make reciprocal concessions. Besides, it is not well to listen only to miserable self-interest. Humanity is concerned, and must not the warming of the people be secured?

PAUL. That is true, and people must have butter to spread on their bread.

JEAN. Certainly. And they must have a bit of pork for their soup.

ALL TOGETHER. Forward, charity! Long live philanthropy! To-morrow, to-morrow, we will take the octrol by assault.

PIERRE. Ah, I forgot. One word more, which is important. My friends, in this selfish age people are suspicious and the purest intentions are often misconstrued. Paul, you plead for wood; Jean, defend butter; and I will devote myself to domestic swine. It is best to head off invidious suspicions.

PAUL AND JEAN (leaving). Upon my word, what a clever fellow!

SECOND TABLEAU: THE COMMON COUNCIL.

PAUL. My dear colleagues, every day great quantities of wood come into Paris and draw out of it large sums of money. If this goes on we shall all be ruined in three years, and what will become of the poor people? [Bravo!] Let us prohibit foreign wood. I am not speaking for myself, for you could not make a toothpick out of all the wood I own. I am, therefore, perfectly disinterested. [Good! good!] But here is Pierre, who has a park, and he will keep our fellow-citizens from freezing. They will no longer be in a state of dependence on the charcoal dealers of the Yonne. Have you ever thought of the risk we run of dying of cold if the proprietors of these foreign forests should take it into their heads not to bring any more wood to Paris? Let us, therefore, prohibit wood. By this means we shall stop the drain of specie, we shall start the wood-chopping business, and open to our workmen a new source of labor and wages. [Applause.]

JEAN. I second the motion of the honorable member—a proposition so philanthropic and so disinterested, as he remarked. It is time that we should stop this intolerable freedom of entry, which has brought a ruinous competition upon our market, so that there is not a province tolerably well situated for producing some one article which does not inundate us with it, sell it to us at a low price, and depress Parisian labor. It is the business of the State to equalize the conditions of production by wisely graduated duties; to allow the entrance from without of whatever is dearer there than at Paris, and thus relieve us from an unequal contest. How, for instance, can they expect us to make milk and butter in Paris as against Brittainy and Normandy? Think, gentlemen, the Bretons have land cheaper, feed more convenient, and labor more abundant. Does not common sense say that the conditions must be equalized by a protecting duty? I ask that the duty on milk and butter be raised to a thousand per cent, and more if necessary. The breakfasts of the people will cost a little more, but wages will rise. We shall see the building of stables and dairies, a good trade in churns, and the foundation of new industries laid. I myself have not the least interest in this plan. I am not a cowherd, nor do I desire to become one. I am moved by the single desire to be useful to the laboring classes. [Expressions of approbation.]

PIERRE. I am happy to see in this assembly statesmen so pure, enlightened, and devoted to the interests of the people. [Cheers.] I admire their self-denial, and can not do better than follow such noble examples. I support their motion, and I also make one to include the Poitou hogs. It is not that I want to become a swineherd or pork dealer, in which case my conscience would forbid my making this motion; but is it not shameful, gentlemen, that we should be paying tribute to these poor Poitevin peasants who have the audacity to come into our own market, take possession of a business that we could have carried on ourselves, and, after having inundated us with sausages and hams, take from us, perhaps, nothing in return? Anyhow, who says that the balance of trade is not in their favor, and that we are not compelled to pay them a tribute in money? Is it not plain that if this Poitevin industry were planted in Paris it would open new fields to Parisian labor? Moreover, gentlemen, is it not very likely, as Mr. Lestiboudois said, that we buy these Poitevin salted meats not with our income, but our capital? Where will this land us? Let us not allow greedy, avaricious, and perfidious rivals to come here and sell things cheaply, thus making it impossible for us to produce them ourselves. Aldermen, Paris has given us its confidence, and we must show ourselves worthy of it. The people are without labor, and we must create it, and if salted meat costs them a little more, we shall at least have the consciousness that we have sacrificed our interests to those of the masses, as every good alderman ought to do. [Thunders of applause.]

A VOICE. I hear much said of the poor people; but under the pretext of giving them labor you begin by taking away from them that which is worth more than labor itself—wood, butter, and soup.

PIERRE, PAUL, AND JEAN. Vote! vote! Away with your theorists and generalizers! Let us vote. [The three motions are carried.]

THIRD TABLEAU: TWENTY YEARS AFTER.

SON. Father, decide; we must leave Paris. Work is slack and everything is dear.

FATHER. My son, you do not know how hard it is to leave the place where we were born.

SON. The worst of all things is to die there of misery.

FATHER. Go, my son, and seek a more hospitable country. For myself, I will not leave the grave where your mother, sisters, and brothers lie. I am eager to find, at last, near them, the rest which is denied me in this city of desolation.

SON. Courage, dear father, we will find work elsewhere—in Poitou, Normandy, or Brittany. They say that the industry of Paris is gradually transferring itself to those distant countries.

FATHER. It is very natural. Unable to sell us wood and food, they stopped producing more than they needed for themselves, and they devoted their spare time and capital to making those things which we formerly furnished them.

SON. Just as at Paris they quit making handsome furniture and fine clothes, in order to plant trees and raise hogs and cows. Though quite young, I have seen vast storehouses, sumptuous buildings, and quays thronged with life on those banks of the Seine which are now given up to meadows and forests.

FATHER. While the provinces are filling up with cities, Paris becomes country. What a frightful revolution! Three mistaken aldermen, aided by public ignorance, have brought down on us this terrible calamity.

SON. Tell me this story, my father.

FATHER. It is very simple. Under the pretext of establishing three new trades at Paris, and of thus supplying labor to the workmen, these men secured the prohibition of wood, butter, and meats. They assumed the right of supplying their fellow-citizens with them. These articles rose immediately to an exorbitant price. Nobody made enough to buy them, and the few who could procure them by using up all they made were unable to buy anything else; consequently all branches of industry stopped at once—all the more so because the provinces no longer offered a market. Misery, death, and immigration began to depopulate Paris.

SON. When will this stop?

FATHER. When Paris has become a meadow and a forest.

SON. The three aldermen must have made a great fortune.

FATHER. At first they made immense profits, but at length they were involved in the common misery.

SON. How was that possible?

FATHER. You see this ruin; it was a magnificent house surrounded by a fine park. If Paris had kept on advancing, Master Pierre would have got more rent from it annually than the whole thing is now worth to him.

SON. How can that be, since he got rid of competition?

FATHER. Competition in selling has disappeared; but competition in buying also disappears every day, and will keep on disappearing until Paris is an open field, and Master Pierre's woodland will be worth no more than an equal number of acres in the forest of Bondy. Thus, a monopoly, like every species of injustice, brings its own punishment upon itself.

SON. This does not seem very plain to me, but the decay of Paris is undeniable. Is there, then, no means of repealing this unjust measure that Pierre and his colleagues adopted twenty years ago?

FATHER. I will confide my secret to you. I will remain at Paris for this purpose; I will call the people to my aid. It depends on them whether they will replace the octroi on its old basis, and dismiss from it this fatal principle, which is grafted on it, and has grown there like a parasite fungus.

SON. You ought to succeed on the very first day.

FATHER. No; on the contrary, the work is a difficult and laborious one. Pierre, Paul, and Jean understand one another perfectly. They are ready to do anything rather than allow the entrance of wood, butter, and meat into Paris. They even have on their side the people, who clearly see the labor which these three protected branches of business give, who know how many wood choppers and cow drivers it gives employment to, but who can not obtain so clear an idea of the labor that would spring up in the free air of liberty.

SON. If this is all that is needed you will enlighten them.

FATHER. My child, at your age, one doubts at nothing. If I wrote, the people would not read; for all their time is occupied in supporting a wretched existence. If I speak the aldermen will shut my mouth. The people will, therefore, remain long in their fatal error; political parties, which build their hopes on their passions, attempt to play upon their prejudices, rather than dispel them. I shall then have to deal with the powers that be—the people and the parties. I see that a storm will burst on the head of the audacious person who dares to rise against an iniquity which is so firmly rooted in the country.

SON. You will have justice and truth on your side.

FATHER. And they will have force and calumny. If I were only young! But age and suffering have exhausted my strength.

SON. Well, father, devote all that you have left to the service of the country. Begin this work of emancipation, and leave to me for an inheritance the task of finishing it.

FOURTH TABLEAU: THE AGITATION.

JACQUES BONHOMME. Parisians, let us demand the reform of the octroi; let it be put back to what it was. Let every citizen be free to buy wood, butter, and meat where it seems good to him.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for liberty!

PIERRE. Parisians, do not allow yourselves to be seduced by these words. Of what avail is the freedom of purchasing, if you have not the means, if labor is wanting? Can Paris produce wood as cheaply as the forest of Bondy, or meat at as low price as Poitou, or butter as easily as Normandy? If you open the doors to these rival products, what will become of the woodcutter, pork dealers, and cattle drivers? They can not do without protection.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for protection!

JACQUES. Protection! How do they protect you, workmen? Do not you compete with one another? Let the wood dealers then suffer competition in their turn. They have no right to raise the price of their wood by law, unless they, also, by law, raise wages. Do you not still love equality?

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for equality!

PIERRE. Do not listen to this factious fellow. We have raised the price of wood, meat, and butter, it is true; but it is in order that we may give good wages to the workmen. We are moved by charity.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for charity!

JACQUES. Use the octroi, if you can, to raise wages, or do not use it to raise the price of commodities. The Parisians do not ask for charity, but justice.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for justice!

PIERRE. It is precisely the dearness of products which will, by reflex action, raise wages.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for dearness!

JACQUES. If butter is dear, it is not because you pay workmen well; it is not even that you may make great profits—it is only because Paris is ill-situated for this business, and because you desired that they should do in the city what ought to be done in the country, and in the country what was done in the city. The people have no more labor, only they labor at something else. They get no more wages, but they do not buy things as cheaply.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for cheapness!

PIERRE. This person seduces you with his fine words. Let us state the question plainly. Is it not true that if we admit butter, wood, and meat, we shall be inundated with them and die of a plethora. There is, then, no other way in which we can preserve ourselves from this new inundation than to shut the door, and we can keep up the price of things only by causing scarcity artificially.

A VERY FEW VOICES. Hurrah for scarcity!

JACQUES. Let us state the question as it is. Among all the Parisians we can divide only what is in Paris; the less wood, butter, and meat there is, the smaller each one's share will be. There will be less if we exclude than if we admit. Parisians, individual abundance can exist only where there is general abundance.

The PEOPLE. Hurrah for abundance!

PIERRE. No matter what this man says, he can not prove to you that it is to your interest to submit to unbridled competition.

The PEOPLE. Down with competition!

JACQUES. Despite all this man's declamation, he can not make you enjoy the sweets of restriction.

The PEOPLE. Down with restriction!

PIERRE. I declare to you that if the poor dealers in cattle and hogs are deprived of their livelihood; if they are sacrificed to theories, I will not be answerable for public order. Workmen, distrust this man. He is an agent of perfidious Normandy; he is under the pay of foreigners; he is a traitor and must be hanged. [The people keep silent.]

JACQUES. Parisians, all that I say now, I said to you twenty years ago, when it occurred to Pierre to use the octroi for his gain and your loss. I am not an agent of Normandy. Hang me if you will, but this will not prevent oppression from being oppression. Friends, you must kill neither Jacques nor Pierre, but liberty if it frightens you, or restriction if it hurts you.

The PEOPLE. Let us hang nobody; but let us emancipate everybody.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16730) to prevent the unauthorized wearing or use of badges, name, titles of officers, insignia, ritual, or ceremonies of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, and the same was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. WEBB to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of W. J. Roberts, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of important business.

TOBACCO TRUST AND PAPER TRUST.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the two opinions delivered by the Supreme Court in the so-called "tobacco trust" and "paper trust" cases. I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the opinions of the Supreme Court referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The opinions are as follows:

Supreme Court of the United States. No. 340. October term, 1905. Edwin F. Hale, appellant, v. William Henkel, United States marshal. Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York. March 12, 1906.

This was an appeal from a final order of the circuit court made June 18, 1905, dismissing a writ of habeas corpus and remanding the petitioner Hale to the custody of the marshal.

The proceeding originated in a subpœna duces tecum, issued April 28, 1905, commanding Hale to appear before the grand jury at a time and place named to "testify and give evidence in a certain action now pending * * * in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, between the United States of America and the American Tobacco Company and MacAndrews & Forbes Company on the part of the United States, and that you bring with you and produce at the time and place aforesaid:"

1. All understandings, agreements, arrangements, or contracts, whether evidenced by correspondence, memoranda, formal agreements, or other writings, between MacAndrews & Forbes Company and six other firms and corporations named, from the date of the organization of the said MacAndrews & Forbes Company.

2. All correspondence by letter or telegram between MacAndrews & Forbes Company and six other firms and corporations.

3. All reports made or accounts rendered by these six companies or corporations to the principal company.

4. Any agreements or contracts or arrangements, however evidenced, between MacAndrews & Forbes Company and the Amsterdam Supply Company or the American Tobacco Company or the Continental Company or the Consolidated Tobacco Company.

5. All letters received by the MacAndrews & Forbes Company since the date of its organization from thirteen other companies named, located in different parts of the United States, and also copies of all correspondence with such companies.

Petitioner appeared before the grand jury in obedience to the subpœna, and before being sworn asked to be advised of the nature of the investigation in which he had been summoned; whether under any statute of the United States, and the specific charge, if any had been made, in order that he might learn whether or not the grand jury had any lawful right to make the inquiry, and also that he be furnished with a copy of the complaint, information, or proposed indictment upon which they were acting; that he had been informed that there was no action pending in the circuit court as stated in the subpœna, and that the grand jury was investigating no specific charge against anyone, and he therefore declined to answer: First, because there was no legal warrant for his examination, and, second, because his answers might tend to incriminate him.

After stating his name, residence, and the fact that he was secretary and treasurer of the MacAndrews & Forbes Company, he declined to answer all other questions in regard to the business of the company, its officers, the location of its office, or its agreement or arrangements with other companies. He was thereupon advised by the assistant district attorney that this was a proceeding under the Sherman Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies; that under the act of 1903, amendatory thereof, no person could be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any matter or thing concerning which he might testify or produce documentary evidence in any prosecution under said act, and that he thereby offered and assured appellant immunity from punishment. The witness still persisted in his refusal to answer all questions.

He also declined to produce the papers and documents called for in the subpœna:

First. Because it would have been a physical impossibility to have gotten them together within the time allowed.

Second. Because he was advised by counsel that he was under no legal obligations to produce anything called for by the subpœna.

Third. Because they might tend to incriminate him.

Whereupon the grand jury reported the matter to the court, and made a presentment that Hale was in contempt, and that the proper proceedings should be taken. Thereupon all the parties appeared before the circuit judge, who directed the witness to answer the questions and produce the papers. Appellant still persisting in his refusal, the circuit judge held him to be in comptempt, and committed him to the custody of the marshal until he should answer the questions and produce the papers. A writ of habeas corpus was thereupon sued out, and a hearing had before another judge of the same court, who discharged the writ and remanded the petitioner.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

Two issues are presented by the record in this case, which are so far distinct as to require separate consideration. They depend upon the applicability of different provisions of the Constitution, and, in determining the question of affirmance or reversal, should not be confounded. The first of these involves the immunity of the witness from oral examination; the second, the legality of his action in refusing to produce the documents called for by the subpœna duces tecum.

1. The appellant justifies his action in refusing to answer the questions propounded to him first, upon the ground that there was no specific "charge" pending before the grand jury against any particular person; second, that the answers would tend to criminate him.

The first objection requires a definition of the word "charge" as used in this connection, which it is not easy to furnish. An accused person is usually charged with crime by a complaint made before a committing magistrate, which has fully performed its office when the party is committed or held to bail, and is quite unnecessary to the finding of an indictment by a grand jury; or by an information of the district attorney, which is of no legal value in prosecutions for felony; or by a presentment usually made, as in this case, for an offense committed in the presence of the jury; or by an indictment which, as often as not, is drawn after the grand jury has acted upon the testimony. If another kind of charge be contemplated, when and by whom must it be preferred? Must it be in writing; and if so, in what form? Or may it be oral? The suggestion of the witness that he should be furnished with a copy of such charge, if applicable to him is applicable to other witnesses summoned before the grand jury. Indeed, it is a novelty in criminal procedure with which we are wholly unacquainted, and one which might involve a betrayal of the secrets of the grand jury room.

Under the ancient English system criminal prosecutions were instituted at the suit of private prosecutors, to which the King lent his name in the interest of the public peace and good order of society. In such cases the usual practice was to prepare the proposed indictment and lay it before the grand jury for their consideration. There was much propriety in this, as the most valuable function of the grand jury was not only to examine into the commission of crimes, but to stand between the prosecutor and the accused and to determine whether the charge was founded upon credible testimony or was dictated by malice or personal ill will.

We are pointed to no case, however, holding that a grand jury can not proceed without the formality of a written charge. Indeed, the oath administered to the foreman, which has come down to us from the most ancient times and is found in Rex v. Shaftsbury (8 Howell's State Trials, 769), indicates that the grand jury was competent to act solely on its own volition. This oath was that "you shall diligently inquire and true presentments make of all such matters, articles, and things as shall be given to you in charge, as of all other matters and things as shall come to your own knowledge touching this present service," etc. This oath has remained substantially unchanged to the present day. There was a difference, too, in the nomenclature of the two cases of accusations by private persons and upon their own knowledge. In the former case their action was embodied in an indictment formally laid before them for their consideration; in the latter case, in the form of a presentment. Says Blackstone in his Commentaries, Book IV, page 301:

"A presentment, properly speaking, is a notice taken by a grand jury of any offense from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the King, as the presentment of a nuisance, a libel, and the like, upon which the officer of the court must afterwards frame an indictment before the party presented can be put to answer it."

Substantially the same language is used in 1 Chitty Crim. Law, 162.

In United States v. Hill (1 Brock., 156), it was indicated by Chief Justice Marshall that a presentment and indictment are to be considered as one act, the second to be considered only as an amendment to the first, and that the usage of this country has been to pass over, unnoticed, presentments on which the attorney does not think it proper to institute proceedings.

In a case arising in Tennessee the grand jury, without the agency of the district attorney, had called witnesses before them, whom they interrogated as to their knowledge concerning the then late Cuban expedition. Mr. Justice Catron sustained the legality of the proceeding and compelled the witnesses to answer. His opinion is reported in Wharton's Criminal Pleading and Practice (8th ed.), section 337. He says: "The grand jury have the undoubted right to send for witnesses and have them sworn to give evidence generally, and to found presentments on the evidence of such witnesses; and the question here is whether a witness thus introduced is legally bound to disclose whether a crime has been committed, and also who committed the crime." His charge contains a thorough discussion of the whole subject.

While presentments have largely fallen into disuse in this country, the practice of grand juries acting upon notice, either of their own knowledge or upon information obtained by them, and incorporating their findings in an indictment, still largely obtains. Whatever doubts there may be with regard to the early English procedure the practice in this country, under the system of public prosecutions carried on by officers of the State appointed for that purpose, has been entirely settled since the adoption of the Constitution. In a lecture delivered by Mr. Justice Wilson of this court, who may be assumed to have known the current practice, before the students of Pennsylvania, he says (Wilson's Works, vol. II, p. 213):

"It has been alleged that grand juries are confined, in their inquiries, to the bills offered to them, to the crimes given them in charge, and to the evidence brought before them by the prosecutor. But these conceptions are much too contracted; they present but a very imperfect and unsatisfactory view of the duty required from grand jurors, and of the trust reposed in them. They are not appointed for the prosecutor or for the court; they are appointed for the Government and for the people; and of both the Government and people it is surely the concernment that, on one hand, all crimes, whether given or not given in charge, whether described or not described with professional skill, should receive the punishment which the law denounces; and that, on the other hand, innocence, however strongly assailed by accusations drawn up in regular form, and by accusers, marshaled in legal array, should, on full investigation, be secure in that protection which the law engages that she shall enjoy inviolate.

"The oath of a grand juryman—and his oath is the commission under which he acts—assigns no limits, except those marked by diligence itself, to the course of his inquiries: Why, then, should it be circumscribed by more contracted boundaries? Shall diligent inquiry be enjoined? And shall the means and opportunities of inquiry be prohibited or restrained?"

Similar language was used by Judge Addison, president of the court of common pleas, in charging the grand jury at the session of the common pleas court in 1791:

"If the grand jury, of their own knowledge, or the knowledge of any of them, or from the examination of witnesses, know of any offense committed in the county, for which no indictment is preferred to them, it is their duty either to inform the officer who prosecutes for the State of the nature of the offense and desire that an indictment for it be laid before them; or, if they do not, or if no such indictment be given them, it is their duty to give such information of it to the court, stating, without any particular form, the facts and circumstances which constitute the offense. This is called a presentment."

The practice then prevailing with regard to the duty of grand juries shows that a presentment may be based not only upon their own personal knowledge, but from the examination of witnesses.

While no case has arisen in this court in which the question has been distinctly presented, the authorities in the State courts largely preponderate in favor of the theory that the grand jury may act upon information received by them from the examination of witnesses without a formal indictment or other charge previously laid before them. An analysis of cases approving of this method of procedure would unduly burden this opinion, but the following are the leading ones upon the subject: Ward v. State, 2 Mo., 120; State v. Terry, 30 Mo., 368; Ex parte Brown, 72 Mo., 83; Commonwealth v. Smyth, 11 Cushing, 473; State v. Walcott, 21 Conn., 272–280; State v. Magrath, 44 N. J. L., 227; Thompson & Merriam on Juries, secs. 615–617. In Blaney v. Maryland (74 Md., 153) the court said:

"However restricted the functions of the grand juries may be elsewhere, we hold that in this State they have plenary inquisitorial powers, and lawfully themselves, and upon their own motion, may originate charges against offenders, though no preliminary proceedings have been had before a magistrate, and though neither the court nor the State's attorney has laid the matter before them."

The rulings of the inferior Federal courts are to the same effect. Mr. Justice Field, in charging a grand jury in California (2 Sawy., 667), said of the grand jury acting upon their own knowledge:

"Not by rumors or reports, but by knowledge acquired from the evidence before you and from your own observations. Whilst you are inquiring as to one offense, another and a different offense may be proved, or witnesses before you may, in testifying, commit the crime of perjury."

Similar language was used in United States v Kimball, 117 Fed. Rep., 156–161; United States v. Reed, 2 Blatch., 449; United States v. Terry, 39 Fed. Rep., 355. And in Frisbie v. United States (157 U. S., 160) it is said by Mr. Justice Brewer:

"But in this country it is for the grand jury to investigate any alleged crime, no matter how or by whom suggested to them, and after determining that the evidence is sufficient to justify putting the suspected party on trial, to direct the preparation of the formal charge or indictment."

There are doubtless a few cases in the State courts which take a contrary view, but they are generally such as deal with the abuses of the system, as the indiscriminate summoning of witnesses with no definite object in view, and in a spirit of meddlesome inquiry. In the most pertinent of these cases (In re Lester, 77 Ga., 143), the mayor of Savannah, who was also ex officio the presiding judge of a court of record, was called upon to bring into the superior court the "information docket" of his court, to be used as evidence by the State in certain cases pending before the grand jury. It was held "that the powers of the body are inquisitorial to a certain extent is undeniable; yet they have to be exercised within well defined limits. * * * The grand jury can find no bill nor make any presentment except upon the testimony of witnesses sworn in a particular case, where the party is charged with a specified offense."

This case is readily distinguishable from the one under consideration, in the fact that the subpœna in this case did specify the action as one between the United States and the American Tobacco Company and the MacAndrews-Forbes Company; and that the Georgia penal code prescribed a form of oath for the grand jury, "that the evidence you shall give the grand jury on this bill of indictment (or presentment, as the case may be, here state the case) shall be the truth," etc. This seems to confine the witness to a charge already laid before the jury.

In Lewis v. Board of Commissioners (74 N. C., 194) the English practice, which requires a preliminary investigation where the accused can confront the accuser and witnesses with testimony, was adopted as more consonant to principles of justice and personal liberty. It was further said that none but witnesses have any business before the grand jury, and that the solicitor may not be present, even to examine them. The practice in this particular in the Federal courts has been quite the contrary.

Other cases lay down the principle that it must be made to appear to the grand jury that there is reason to believe that a crime has been committed, and that they have not the power to institute or prosecute an inquiry on the chance that some crime may be discovered. (In Matter of Morse, 18 N. Y. Criminal Rep., 312; State v. Adams, 2 Lea, 647, an unimportant case, turning upon a local statute.) In Pennsylvania grand juries are somewhat more restricted in their powers than is usual in other States (McCullough v. Commonwealth, 67 Penn. St., 30; Rowand v. Commonwealth, 82 Penn. St., 405; Commonwealth v. Green, 126 Penn. St., 531), and in Tennessee inquisitorial powers are granted in certain cases and withheld in others. (State v. Adams, 70 Tenn., 647; State v. Smith, 19 Tenn., 99.)

We deem it entirely clear that under the practice in this country, at least, the examination of witnesses need not be preceded by a presentment or indictment formally drawn up, but that the grand jury may proceed, either upon their own knowledge or upon the examination of witnesses, to inquire for themselves whether a crime cognizable by the court has been committed; that the result of their investigations may be subsequently embodied in an indictment, and that in summoning witnesses it is quite sufficient to apprise them of the names of the parties with respect to whom they will be called to testify, without indicating the nature of the charge against them. So valuable is this inquisitorial power of the grand jury that in States where felonies may be prosecuted by information as well as indictment the power is ordinarily reserved to courts of empaneling grand juries for the investigation of riots, frauds, and nuisances, and other cases where it is impracticable to ascertain in advance the names of the persons implicated. It is impossible to conceive that in such cases the examination of witnesses must be stopped until a basis is laid by an indictment formally preferred, when the very object of the examination is to ascertain who shall be indicted. As criminal prosecutions are instituted by the State through an officer selected for that purpose, he is vested with a certain discretion with respect to the cases he will call to their attention, the number and character of the witnesses, the form in which the indictment shall be drawn, and other details of the proceedings. Doubtless abuses of this power may be imagined, as if the object of the inquiry were merely to pry into the details of domestic or business life. But were such abuses called to the attention of the court it would doubtless be alert to repress them. While the grand jury may not indict upon current rumors or unverified reports, they may act upon knowledge acquired either from their own observations or upon the evidence of witnesses given before them.

2. Appellant also invokes the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," and in reply to various questions put to him he declined to answer, on the ground that he would thereby incriminate himself.

The answer to this is found in a proviso to the general appropriation act of February 25, 1903 (32 Stat., 854–903), that "no person shall be prosecuted or be subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution under said acts," of which the antitrust law is one, providing, however, that "no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution or punishment for perjury committed in so testifying."

While there may be some doubt whether the examination of witnesses before a grand jury is a suit or prosecution, we have no doubt that it is a "proceeding" within the meaning of this proviso. The word should receive as wide a construction as is necessary to protect the witness in his disclosures, whenever such disclosures are made in pursuance of a judicial inquiry, whether such inquiry be instituted by a grand jury or upon the trial of an indictment found by them. The word "proceeding" is not a techincal one, and is aptly used by courts to designate an inquiriy before a grand jury. It has received this interpretation in a number of cases. (Yates v. The Queen, 14 Q. B. D., 648; Hogan v. State, 30 Wis., 428.)

The object of the amendment is to establish in express language and upon a firm basis the general principle of English and American jurisprudence, that no one shall be compelled to give testimony which may expose him to prosecution for crime. It is not declared that he may not be compelled to testify to facts which may impair his reputation for probity or even tend to disgrace him, but the line is drawn at testimony that may expose him to prosecution. If the testimony relate to criminal acts long since past, and against the prosecution of which the statute of limitations has run, or for which he has already received a pardon or is guaranteed an immunity, the amendment does not apply.

The interdiction of the fifth amendment operates only where a witness is asked to incriminate himself. In other words, to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge. But if the criminality has already been taken away the amendment ceases to apply. The criminality provided against is a present not a past criminality, which lingers only as a memory and involves no present danger of prosecution. To put an extreme case, a man in his boyhood or youth may have committed acts which the law pronounces criminal, but it would never be asserted that he would thereby be made a criminal for life. It is here that the law steps in and says that if the offense be outlawed or pardoned, or its criminality has been removed by statute, the amendment ceases to apply. The extent of this immunity was fully considered by this court in Counselman v. Hitchcock (142 U. S., 547), in which the immunity offered by Revised Statutes, section 860, was declared to be insufficient. In consequence of this decision an act was passed applicable to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission in almost the exact language of the act of February 25, 1903, above quoted. This act was declared by this court in Brown v. Walker (161 U. S., 591) to afford absolute immunity against prosecution for the offense to which the question related and deprived the witness of his constitutional right to refuse to answer. Indeed, the act was passed apparently to meet the declaration in Counselman v. Hitchcock (586), that "a statutory enactment to be valid must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates." If the constitutional amendment were unaffected by the immunity statute, it would put it within the power of the witness to be his own judge as to what would tend to incriminate him, and would justify him in refusing to answer almost any question in a criminal case, unless it clearly appeared that the immunity was not set up in good faith.

We need not restate the reasons in Brown v. Walker, both in the opinion of the court and in the dissenting opinion, wherein all the prior authorities were reviewed and a conclusion reached by a majority of the court which fully covers the case under consideration.

The suggestion that a person who has testified compulsorily before a grand jury may not be able, if subsequently indicted for some matter concerning which he testified, to procure the evidence necessary to maintain his plea, is more fanciful than real. He would have not only his own oath in support of his immunity, but the notes often, though not always, taken of the testimony before the grand jury, as well as the testimony of the prosecuting officer, and of every member of the jury present. It is scarcely possible that all of them would have forgotten the general nature of his incriminating testimony or that any serious conflict would arise therefrom. In any event, it is a question relating to the weight of the testimony, which could scarcely be considered in determining the effect of the immunity statute. The difficulty of maintaining a case upon the available evidence is a danger which the law does not recognize. In prosecuting a case, or in setting up a defense, the law takes no account of the practical difficulty which either party may have in procuring his testimony. It judges of the law by the facts which each party claims, and not by what he may ultimately establish.

The further suggestion that the statute offers no immunity from prosecution in the State courts was also fully considered in Brown v. Walker and held to be no answer. The converse of this was also decided in Jack v. Kansas (199 U. S., 372), namely, that the fact that an immunity granted to a witness under a State statute would not prevent a prosecution of such witness for a violation of a Federal statute, did not invalidate such statute under the fourteenth amendment. It was held both by this court and by the supreme court of Kansas that the possibility that information given by the witness might be used under the Federal act did not operate as a reason for permitting the witness to refuse to answer, and that a danger so unsubstantial and remote did not impair the legal immunity. Indeed, if the argument were a sound one it might be carried still further and held to apply not only to State prosecutions within the same jurisdiction, but to prosecutions under the criminal laws of other States to which the witness might have subjected himself. The question has been fully considered in England, and the conclusion reached that the only danger to be considered is one arising within the same jurisdiction and under the same sovereignty. (Queen v. Boyes, 1 B. & S., 311; King of Sicilies v. Wilcox, 7 State Trials (N. S.), 1049, 1068; State v. March, 1 Jones (Ga.), 526; State v. Thomas, 98 N. C., 599.) The entire question of immunity is also exhaustively treated in Wigmore on Evidence, sections 2255–2259.

The case of United States v. Saline Bank (1 Pet., 100) is not in conflict with this. That was a bill for discovery, filed by the United States against the cashier of the Saline Bank, in the district court of the Virginia district, who pleaded that the emission of certain unlawful bills took place, within the State of Virginia, by the law whereof penalties were inflicted for such emissions. It was held that defendants were not bound to answer and subject them to those penalties. It is sufficient to say that the prosecution was under a State law which imposed the penalty, and that the Federal court was simply administering the State law, and no question arose as to a prosecution under another jurisdiction.

But it is further insisted that while the immunity statute may protect individual witnesses it would not protect the corporation of which appellant was the agent and representative. This is true, but the answer is that it was not designed to do so. The right of a person under the fifth amendment to refuse to incriminate himself is purely a personal privilege of the witness. It was never intended to permit him to plead the fact that some third person might be incriminated by his testimony, even though he were the agent of such person. A privilege so extensive might be used to put a stop to the examination of every witness who was called upon to testify before the grand jury with regard to the doings or business of his principal, whether such principal were an individual or a corporation. The question whether a corporation is a "person" within the meaning of this amendment really does not arise, except perhaps where a corporation is called upon to answer a bill of discovery, since it can only be heard by oral evidence in the person of some one of its agents or employees. The amendment is limited to a person who shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, and if he can not set up the privilege of a third person, he certainly can not set up the privilege of a corporation. As the combination or conspiracies provided against by the Sherman antitrust act can ordinarily be proved only by the testimony of parties thereto, in the person of their agents or employees, the privilege claimed would practically nullify the whole act of Congress. Of what use would it be for the legislature to declare these combinations unlawful if the judicial power may close the door of access to every available source of information upon the subject? Indeed, so strict is the rule that the privilege is a personal one that it has been held in some cases that counsel will not be allowed to make the objection. We hold that the questions should have been answered.

3. The second branch of the case relates to the nonproduction by the witness of the books and papers called for by the subpœna duces tecum. The witness put his refusal on the ground, first, that it was impossible for him to collect them within the time allowed; second, because he was advised by counsel that under the circumstances he was under no obligation to produce them; and finally, because they might tend to incriminate him.

Had the witness relied solely upon the first ground, doubtless the court would have given him the necessary time. The last ground we have already held untenable. While the second ground does not set forth with technical accuracy the real reason for declining to produce them, the witness could not be expected to speak with legal exactness, and we think is entitled to assert that the subpœna was an infringement upon the fourth amendment to the Constitution, which declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

The construction of this amendment was exhaustively considered in the case of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616), which was an information in rem against certain cases of plate glass, alleged to have been imported in fraud of the revenue acts. On the trial it became important to show the quantity and value of the glass contained in a number of cases previously imported; and the district judge, under section 5 of the act of June 22, 1874, directed a notice to be given to the claimants, requiring them to produce the invoice of these cases under penalty that the allegations respecting their contents should be taken as confessed. We held (p. 622) "that a compulsory production of a man's private papers to establish a criminal charge against him, or to forfeit his property, is within the scope of the fourth amendment, in all cases in which a search and seizure would be," and that the order in question was an unreasonable search and seizure within that amendment.

The history of this provision of the Constitution and its connections with the former practice of general warrants, or writs of assistance, was given at great length, and the conclusion reached that the compulsory extortion of a man's own testimony, or of his private papers, to connect him with a crime or a forfeiture of his goods, is illegal (p. 634), "is compelling a man to be a witness against himself, within the meaning of the fifth amendment, and is the equivalent of a search and seizure—and an unreasonable search and seizure—within the fourth amendment.

Subsequent cases treat the fourth and fifth amendments as quite distinct, having different histories, and performing separate functions. Thus in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S., 447), the constitutionality of the interstate-commerce act, so far as it authorized the circuit courts to use their processes in aid of inquiries before the Commission, was sustained, the court observing in that connection:

"It was clearly competent for Congress, to that end, to invest the Commission with authority to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter legally committed to that body for investigation. We do not understand that any of these propositions are disputed in this case."

The case of Adams v. United States (192 U. S., 585), which was a writ of error to the supreme court of the State of New York, involving the seizure of certain gambling paraphernalia, was treated as involving the construction of the fourth and fifth amendments to the Federal Constitution. It was held, in substance, that the fact that papers pertinent to the issue may have been illegally taken from the possession of the party against whom they are offered, was not a valid objection to their admissibility; that the admission, as evidence in a criminal trial, of papers found in the execution of a valid search warrant prior to the indictment was not an infringement of the fifth amendment, and that by the introduction of such evidence defendant was not compelled to incriminate himself. The substance of the opinion is contained in the following paragraph. It was contended that "If a search warrant is issued for stolen property and burglars' tools be discovered and seized, they are to be excluded from testimony by force of these amendments. We think they were never intended to have that effect, but are rather designed to protect against compulsory testimony from a defendant against himself in a criminal trial, and to punish wrongful invasion of the home of the citizen or the unwarranted seizure of his papers and property, and to render invalid legislation or judicial procedure having such effect."

The Boyd case must also be read in connection with the still later case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baird (194 U. S., 25), which arose upon the petition of the Commission for orders requiring the testimony of witnesses and the production of certain books, papers, and documents. The case grew out of a complaint against certain railway companies that they charged unreasonable and unjust rates for the transportation of anthracite coal. Objection was made to the production of certain contracts between these companies upon the ground that it would compel the witnesses to furnish evidence against themselves, in violation of the fifth amendment, and would also subject the parties to unreasonable searches and seizures. It was held that the circuit court erred in holding the contracts to be irrelevant and in refusing to order their production as evidence by the witnesses who were parties to the appeal. In delivering the opinion of the court the Boyd case was again considered in connection with the fourth and fifth amendments, and the remark made by Mr. Justice Day that the immunity statute of 1893 "protects the witness from such use of the testimony given as will result in his punishment for crime or the forfeiture of his estate."

Having already held that by reason of the immunity act of 1903 the witness could not avail himself of the fifth amendment, it follows that he can not set up that amendment as against the production of the books and papers, since in respect to these he would also be protected by the immunity act. We think it quite clear that the search and seizure clause of the fourth amendment was not intended to interfere with the power of courts to compel, through a subpœna duces tecum, the production, upon a trial in court, of documentary evidence. As remarked in Summers v. Mosely (2 Cr. & M., 477), it would be "utterly impossible to carry on the administration of justice" without this writ. The following authorities are conclusive upon this question: Amey v. Long, 9 East, 473; Bull v. Loveland, 10 Pick., 9; United States Express Co. v. Henderson, 69 Iowa, 40; Greenleaf on Evidence, 469*a*; Wigmore on Evidence, section 2264.

If, whenever an officer or employee of a corporation were summoned before a grand jury as a witness he could refuse to produce the books and documents of such corporation, upon the ground that they would incriminate the corporation itself, it would result in the failure of a large number of cases where the illegal combination was determinable only upon the examination of such papers. Conceding that the witness was an officer of the corporation under investigation, and that he was entitled to assert the rights of the corporation with respect to the production of its books and papers, we are of the opinion that there is a clear distinction in this particular between an individual and a corporation, and that the latter has no right to refuse to submit its books and papers for an examination at the suit of the State. The individual may stand upon his constitutional rights as a citizen. He is entitled to carry on his private business in his own way. His power to contract is unlimited. He owes no duty to the State or to his neighbors to divulge his business, or to open his doors to an investigation, so far as it may tend to criminate him. He owes no such duty to the State, since he receives nothing therefrom beyond the protection of his life and property. His rights are such as existed by the law of the land long antecedent to the organization of the State, and can only be taken from him by due process of law and in accordance with the Constitution. Among his rights are a refusal to incriminate himself, and the immunity of himself and his property from arrest or seizure except under a warrant of the law. He owes nothing to the public so long as he does not trespass upon their rights.

Upon the other hand the corporation is a creature of the State. It is presumed to be incorporated for the benefit of the public. It receives certain special privileges and franchises, and holds them subject to the laws of the State and the limitations of its charter. Its powers are limited by law. It can make no contract not authorized by its charter. Its rights to act as a corporation are only preserved to it so long as it obeys the laws of its creation. There is a reserved right in the legislature to investigate its contracts and find out whether it has exceeded its powers. It would be a strange anomaly to hold that a State, having chartered a corporation, to make use of certain franchises, could not in the exercise of its sovereignty inquire how these franchises had been employed, and whether they had been abused, and demand the production of the corporate books and papers for that purpose. The defense amounts to this: That an officer of a corporation, which is charged with a criminal violation of the statute may plead the criminality of such corporation as a refusal to produce its books. To state this proposition is to answer it. While an individual may lawfully refuse to answer incriminating questions unless protected by an immunity statute, it does not follow that a corporation, vested with special privileges and franchises, may refuse to show its hand when charged with an abuse of such privileges.

It is true that the corporation in this case was chartered under the laws of New Jersey, and that it receives its franchise from the legislature of the State; but such franchises, so far as they involve questions of interstate commerce, must also be exercised in subordination to the power of Congress to regulate such commerce, and in respect to this the General Government may also assert a sovereign authority to ascertain whether such franchises have been exercised in a lawful manner, with a due regard to its own laws. Being subject to this dual sovereignty the General Government possesses the same right to see that its own laws are respected as the State would have with respect to the special franchises vested in it by the laws of the State. The powers of the General Government in this particular in the vindication of its own laws are the same as if the corporation had been created by an act of Congress. It is not intended to intimate, however, that it has a general visitatorial power over State corporations.

4. Although, for the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that an officer of a corporation which is charged with a violation of a statute of the State of its creation, or of an act of Congress passed in the exercise of its constitutional powers, can not refuse to produce the books and papers of such corporation, we do not wish to be understood as holding that a corporation is not entitled to immunity, under the fourth amendment, against unreasonable searches and seizures. A corporation is, after all, but an association of individuals under an assumed name and with a distinct legal entity. In organizing itself as a collective body it waives no constitutional immunities appropriate to such body. Its property can not be taken without compensation. It can only be proceeded against by due process of law, and is protected, under the fourteenth amendment, against unlawful discrimination. (Gulf, etc., Railroad Company v. Ellis, 165 U. S., 150, 154, and cases cited.) Corporations are a necessary feature of modern business activity, and their aggregated capital has become the source of nearly all great enterprises.

We are also of opinion that an order for the production of books and papers may constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the fourth amendment. While a search ordinarily implies a quest by an officer of the law, and a seizure contemplates a forcible dispossession of the owner, still, as was held in the Boyd case, the substance of the offense is the compulsory production of private papers, whether under a search warrant or a subpœna duces tecum, against which the person, be he individual or corporation, is entitled to protection. Applying the test of reasonableness to the present case, we think the subpœna duces tecum is far too sweeping in its terms to be regarded as reasonable. It does not require the production of a single contract, or of contracts with a particular corporation, or a limited number of documents, but all understandings, contracts, or correspondence between the MacAndrews & Forbes Company and no less than six different companies, as well as all reports made and accounts rendered by such companies from the date of the organization of the MacAndrews & Forbes Company, as well as all letters received by that company since its organization from more than a dozen different companies, situated in seven different States in the Union.

If the writ had required the production of all the books, papers, and documents found in the office of the MacAndrews & Forbes Company, it would scarcely be more universal in its operation, or more completely put a stop to the business of that company. Indeed, it is difficult to say how its business could be carried on after it had been denuded of this mass of material, which is not shown to be necessary in the prosecution of this case, and is clearly in violation of the general principle of law with regard to the particularity required in the description of documents necessary to a search warrant or subpœna. Doubtless many, if not all, of these documents may ultimately be required, but some necessity should be shown, either from an examination of the witnesses orally, or from the known transactions of these companies with the other companies implicated, or some evidence of their materiality produced, to justify an order for the production of such a mass of papers. A general subpœna of this description is equally indefensible as a search warrant would be if couched in similar terms. (Ex parte Brown, 72 Mo., 83; Shaftsbury v. Arrowsmith, 4 Ves., 66; Lee v. Angas, L. R. 2 Eq., 59.)

Of course, in view of the power of Congress over interstate commerce, to which we have adverted, we do not wish to be understood as holding that an examination of the books of a corporation, if duly authorized by act of Congress, would constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the fourth amendment.

But this objection to the subpœna does not go to the validity of the order remanding the petitioner, which is therefore affirmed.

Supreme Court of the United States. No. 341, October term, 1905. William H. McAlister, appellant, v. William Henkel, United States marshal. Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York. March 12, 1906.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves many of the questions already passed upon in the opinion in Hale v. Henkel, differing from that case, however, in two important particulars: First, in the fact that there was a complaint and charge made on behalf of the United States against the American Tobacco Company and the Imperial Tobacco Company under the so-called "Sherman Act," and, second, that the subpœna pointed out the particular writings sought for (three agreements), giving in each case the date, the names of the parties, and, in one instance, a suggestion of the contents.

The witness McAlister, who was secretary and a director of the American Tobacco Company, refused to answer or produce the documents for practically the same reasons assigned by the appellant Hale, demanding to be advised what the suit or proceeding was, and to be furnished with a copy of the proposed indictment. A copy of one of the agreements with three English companies and certified by the consul-general of the United States is contained in the record.

For reasons already partly set forth, we think that the immunity provided by the fifth amendment against self-incrimination is personal to the witness himself, and that he can not set up the privilege of another person or of a corporation as an excuse for a refusal to answer—in other words, the privilege is that of the witness himself and not that of the party on trial. The authorities are practically uniform on this point: Commonwealth v. Shaw (4 Cush., 594); State v. Wentworth (65 Maine, 234, 241); Reynolds v. Reynolds (15 Cox Criminal Cases, 108, 115). In New York Life Insurance Co. v. People (195 Ill., 430) the privilege was claimed by a corporation, but the agent of an insurance company was permitted to testify in a suit for the recovery of a statutory penalty to facts showing the performance by the corporation of the act prohibited. An elaborate history of this privilege and its limitations is given by Professor Wigmore in his recent work on Evidence, sections 2250 to 2259. Indeed, the authorities are numerous to the effect that an officer of a corporation can not set up the privilege of a corporation as against his testimony or the production of their books.

The questions are the same as those involved in the Hale case, without the objectionable feature of the subpœna, and the order of the circuit court is therefore affirmed.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. McLAIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4364) granting an increase of pension to George W. Neece, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2288); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5488) granting a pension to Margaret E. Foster, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2289); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7232) granting a pension to Alba B. Bean, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2290); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8319) granting an increase of pension to John Gardner Stocks, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2291); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8475) granting a pension to John F. Tathem, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2292); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8687) granting a pension to William I. Lusch, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2293); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8869) granting an increase of pension to Nathan Coward, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2294); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9270) granting an increase of pension to Wiley B. Johnson, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2295); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9271) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Henry Martin, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2296); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McLAIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10424) granting a pension to Smith Thompson, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2297); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10449) granting an increase of pension to George B. D. Alexander, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2298); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10451) granting an increase of pension to Robert M. White, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2299); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10452) granting an increase of pension to Richard C. Daly, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2300); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10830) granting an increase of pension to Dudley Portwood, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2301); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10831) granting an increase of pension to Levi C. Bishop, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2302); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11046) granting an increase of pension to Helen G. Heiner, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2303); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11331) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Rowan, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2304); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11332) granting an increase of pension to William F. Kenner, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2305); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12556) granting an increase of pension to Joseph W. Coppage, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2306); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12059) granting an increase of pension to Mildred W. Mitchell, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2307); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13504) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Thompson, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2308); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McLAIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14566) granting an increase of pension to Robert E. McKiernan, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2309); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14677) granting a pension to Reuben R. Ballenger, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2310); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McLAIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14915) granting an increase of pension to Andrew W. Tracy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2311); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14920) granting an increase of pension to Winfield S. Bruce, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2312); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15277) granting an increase of pension to George W. Pierce, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2313); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15306) granting an increase of pension to Asa Wall, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2314); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15415) granting an increase of pension to Ann R. Nelson, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2315); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15621) granting an increase of pension to Caleb M. Tarter, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2316); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15687) granting an increase of pension to William F. M. Reil, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2317); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15701) granting an increase of pension to William Brown, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2318); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15867) granting an increase of pension to Annie M. Stevens, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2319); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DRAPER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15894) granting an increase of pension to Alma L. Wells, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2320); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15907) granting an increase of pension to Louis De Laittre, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2321); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McLAIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16023) granting an increase of pension to Sheldon B. Fargo, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2322); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16381) leasing and demising certain lands in La Plata County, Colo., to the P. F. U. Rubber Company.

Whereas all the present commercial sources of supply for caoutchouc, or india-rubber gum, are wholly without the boundaries of the United States and wholly within the Tropics; and

Whereas the multifold uses of rubber make its economical production a matter of national necessity; and

Whereas within the past two years it has been discovered that a hitherto worthless weed growing in the higher altitudes of the Rocky Mountain States may, with proper treatment, yield a rubber gum of good quality; and

Whereas the P. F. U. Rubber Company has erected a factory at Durango, in the State of Colorado, for treating this weed and extracting the gum, and has, after an exhaustive search extending over several States and Territories, determined that the plant has reached its highest development (so far as the percentage and quality of its gum is concerned) in the specimens found on the tract of desert land described below: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tract of land, situated in the county of La Plata, in the State of Colorado, to wit, the fractional section 3 U; lots 1, 2, and 3 of fractional section 4 U; east half and east half of west half of section 9 U; west half and west half of east half of section 10 U; southwest quarter of southwest quarter of section 11 U; west half of west half of section 14; all of sections 15 and 16; east half of northeast quarter and south half of section 17; east half of southwest quarter, southeast quarter, and north half of section 20; north half of northeast quarter, southwest quarter of northeast quarter, northwest quarter of southeast quarter, and west half of section 21; west half of section 28; southeast quarter of section 29; all of section 32, and west half of section 33, containing 5,410.55 acres, more or less, all in township 34 north, range 11 west, New Mexico principal meridian, Colorado, excepting therefrom lands covered by any valid subsisting right, be, and is hereby, set apart and withdrawn from entry or settlement under any of the land laws of the United States. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, directed, and empowered to lease and demise to the P. F. U. Rubber Company, a Michigan corporation, and its successors and assigns, for and during the full period of ten years from and after the approval of this act, for its and their sole and exclusive use, for the purpose, however, of an experimental farm on which to plant, improve, and harvest said plant or weed, or similar rubber-producing plants or shrubs, with permission to the said P. F. U. Rubber Company, its successors and assigns, to erect and construct thereon such buildings, machinery, and fences, and to construct and make such ditches, flumes, canals, roads, telegraph, telephone, and power-transmission lines, tracks, and trails over the said lands and over and upon the public lands adjacent thereto, as may be necessary or proper for the uses and purposes herein set forth, subject, however, to the power and right in the Secretary of the Interior to require the removal, change or location, character, or nature of any of the said structures or improvements, and with full power, right, and authority to gather and collect said plants, shrubs, and weeds, and remove the same, and also to make any beneficial use of said lands not inconsistent with the limitations and conditions herein contained, in furtherance only, however, of the uses and purposes of said experimental farm. The said lease to be in consideration of such annual rental therefor as the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, deem best, the amount thereof for the term of said lease to be fixed and determined prior to the execution thereof, and the compensation thereunder to be received to be held by the Secretary of the Interior for the use and benefit of the Southern Ute Indians. And it shall be further stipulated in said lease that said P. F. U. Rubber Company shall, in so far as it may be reasonably practicable so to do, employ and prefer in the work and labor to be done on said premises suitable and competent Indians, without limiting the rights of the said P. F. U. Company to employ such other labor as may at any time be necessary or expedient to carry on said operations.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States may at any time during said period of ten years, at his discretion, terminate and cancel this lease by revoking the same and the annulling thereof in case the said experiment proposed or the use to be made of said lands shall be unsatisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior; or the President may, in his discretion, convey all of said lands, or any part thereof, by patenting the same to said rubber company, its successors and assigns, in fee and absolutely without restrictions, upon payment to the United States of America of $1.25 per acre therefor, for the sole and exclusive use and benefit, however, of the Southern Ute Indians.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall grant or convey or be held to grant or convey to said company, its successors or assigns, during such time as it or they may hold said lands under the lease hereby authorized, any right, license, or privilege to take or remove from said premises, or any part thereof, any growing timber, stone, clay, ore, metals, or minerals of any kind or nature whatsoever, saving except such timber and stone as may be necessary for the immediate use of said company, its successors and assigns, in the building, erection, or maintenance of such fences, flumes, ditches, roads, telephone, telegraph, and power transmission lines, buildings, and machinery: Provided, however, That no patent shall issue for the said land or any part thereof until the Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain by such examination, prospecting, and mineral tests as he may deem necessary and proper the existence of any valuable and merchantable deposits of coal or other mineral upon such premises; and any such merchantable deposits of coal or other mineral so determined, together with the right of ingress or egress, shall be excluded from said patent. The right of entry and egress for the purposes of such examinations and tests shall further be reserved in said lease.

SEC. 4. That the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not be sold, assigned, transferred, or conveyed to any person or persons, firm, or corporation whatsoever, save and except upon the express permission in writing of the Secretary of the Interior. And in case of any violation of this provision the lease and privileges hereby granted shall at once and forever cease and determine.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble; on page 3, line 6, strike out the word "said" and insert "the," and in line 6, page 3, after the word "weed," insert "known as the pinguay weed;" in line 15, page 3, strike out the word "or" and insert the word "of," and in line 24, page 3, after the word "best," insert "at not less than 3 cents an acre," and on page 4, line 20, after the words "America of," insert "not less than," and on page 5, line 4, strike out the word "saving" and insert "save and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman, has this bill been reported unanimously by a committee?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. This bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands—that is, there is no dissenting report. It is favorably reported by the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Indian Commissioner.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Have you submitted the matter to the Speaker and explained it to him?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And obtained his consent?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield me ten minutes?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. There is no time allowed, as I understand it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer and unless it is accepted I shall object to unanimous consent myself.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman what kind of a plant these people propose to grow?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. It is a succulent plant containing in the root a gum similar to and answering many of the purposes of india rubber, and in the arts it can be used for any purpose for which fairly good rubber can be used. The question of difficulty is in the extraction of the rubber and the growth and development of the plant so there will be a uniform rubber content. As at present grown some plants have a very small rubber content and some a very considerable one and all these questions have to be investigated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What I desire to get at is this. Does the use of the plant which you propose to put it to in this bill destroy the plant entirely?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes; the whole plant is torn up by the roots and is then put in a macerating machine and the rubber extracted in that way.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will ask this question: Is it not a permanent injury to the lands of the Indians to destroy this rubber plant which has a value?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. No; because the plant reproduces itself from the small roots left in the ground and that is the way in which the plant is grown. The top is pulled up and then the plant reproduces itself in about three years—or the period of maturity is about three years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the gentleman does not think it will be a permanent injury to the land?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. On the contrary, the Department of Agriculture thinks it will be of benefit to the land if it is possible to cultivate and secure its reproduction under definite conditions and in a scientific and successful manner.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Another question. I see a reference here to coal. Is it the intention of the bill that the coal shall also pass to this rubber company in the land?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The intention of the bill is that all minerals shall be excluded.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That all minerals shall be excluded?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman this question. I have been trying for years to get for American prospectors and American miners the right to go on the Indian reservations to develop the precious metals, believing that it would be for the benefit of the entire people of the United States. Why is it that a rubber company shall be allowed to go upon this reservation to get rubber, or anybody to get any other kind of material, and these American miners must be barred from going on the land for the same things?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Forthis reason, if there is any distinction, I would reply. This is a new and special thing, and is of interest to the whole American people. Now, the growth of rubber has become smaller and smaller year by year, and the demand for it greater. The exigencies of the situation are increasing. We imported last year about 75,000,000 pounds of rubber, and the price has increased something like 300 per cent in the last few years. In other words, we are gradually developing a shortage of rubber, and under such corcumstances it has seemed wise to the committee and wise to the Department to which this bill was referred to give this small encouragement to he development of a very important industry, and it is appulied to only a very small tract of useless nonagricultural land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many acres are involved in this bill?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. A little more than 5,000. It is high mesa land, seven or eight thousand feet high; above any irrigation ditch and above the possibilities of irrigation, where there are no artesian wells and streams. It is absolutely arid. This land has been opened for settlement twenty years, nearly twenty-five years, and during all that time, in that vicinity, there has been only one location by a homesteader.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that the prospector should have the same right given him to go in and develop all that country, to search for gold or silver or other valuable minerals as any rubber company?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. That question is not involved in this discussion.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it a bad precedent to set for Congress to permit a certain company, a rubber company or any other company, to go into a reservation and exploit it, and the very same lawmaking body refuse to report a bill to this House permitting prospectors, individual citizens of the United States, to do the very same thing in effect?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I think the gentleman is speaking from a misapprehension. This is not a reservation. It has been open for more than twenty years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is Indian land.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. No; it has been opened up and the proceeds of it go to the Southern Utes, and will be covered into the Southern Ute fund under the treaty with them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The funds go to the Indians?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. But the land has been opened to location for years. It is open to entry and appropriation under the public-land laws; anybody who wants them can go in and take these lands to-day, and it has been opened for twenty-five years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Congress has the right to control it; so it has with the minerals. I shall not object to the gentleman's bill. The method is all that I am objecting to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment to read an amendment I desire to offer?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is a rubber enterprise. Rubber is a very valuable and a very useful article, though "rubber-necking" is not. To avoid, Mr. Speaker, this infant rubber concern from being either partly purchased or crushed out by the great rubber trust of the United States, and almost the balance of the world, I am going to offer a proposed amendment as a new section, which I feel quite sure my friend will accept, to read thus:

That all rights acquired hereby shall revest in the United States in the event that said company, or its successor or successors, shall enter into, directly or indirectly, any trust, combine, company, or other concern operating or existing contrary to the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," and its amendments.

To this amendment, Mr. Speaker, I take it that the gentleman has no objection.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I have no objection to the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you accept it?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. No; I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have no objection to the consideration of his amendment. I am perfectly willing that it be considered. As the mover of the bill, however, I do not want to accept it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say in answer that the gentleman in interest in this concern, about its being a part of or controlled by the rubber trust, he said to me he much feared that the rubber trust would paralyze and destroy this concern. Now, I am trying to protect this concern from the rubber trust and to protect this concern from itself going into the monopoly and great combination in the rubber business.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The gentleman does not mean to say that the proponents of this measure fear that this interest is controlled by the rubber trust? On the contrary——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On the contrary, the gentleman said that he feared the rubber trust.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. On the contrary, if they have any fear they fear the rubber trust.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is exactly what I said, and nothing more.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I do not think the amendment is necessary or proper at this time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do think it is.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I am perfectly willing that the House should vote on this amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Admissions, undisputed, came out before the Public Lands Committee, of which I have the fortune or misfortune to be a member; the laws in land matters out West have not been enforced until the last twelve or fifteen months, when the President of the United States took charge of the situation, and one man was convicted out there and fined and sentenced to imprisonment, but a special marshal, the defendant's lawyer, carried him to a club out in Omaha and kept him there six hours as the imprisonment that he had to serve. That is the way they administer the law out there, and that being the case I have offered this amendment in the utmost good faith to say that when this concern is gobbled up by the rubber trust then all the rights you acquire in this matter shall revert to the United States. It is a perfectly fair proposition, and I will not consent to consideration unless it is accepted.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman, who is a member of the committee.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have not had an opportunity to look into the merits of this bill as I should like to have done. I oppose its passage at this time. I oppose the manner in which it is brought here rather than because of any defect in the bill itself. Mr. Speaker, how has this bill come before the House for consideration? As the record is being made up, it will appear that the gentleman from Colorado of his own motion, in his own right, moved the consideration of his bill. In that respect the record will not reveal the truth. The gentleman was not recognized until he had first surrendered his constitutional rights as a representative of the people and crept into your private room, Mr. Speaker, there to supplicate you to extend to him your grace.

No Member can submit any matter to a vote of the House until he shall have first sought and found favor in your sight. The Constitution contemplates that the Speaker shall be the servant of the House. In defiance of the Constitution you have made yourself its master. You have organized every committee so that no bill can be reported without your consent. Unless you are willing no Member can move to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill and take it up in the House. You subject the rights and destinies of this great people to the dictates of your own unbridled will. Who stands to-day between a progressive, enlightened people and the statehood to which they are entitled? You, sir; only you. You crack your whip and a majority of this House cowers at your feet. You turn your thumbs down and the House deals the deathblow to prostrate, bleeding Oklahoma. I read in the morning paper:

Uncle Joe has given it out flatfooted that he will not permit the House to concur in the Senate amendments on the statehood bill.

What a horrible announcement to be made in a free country!

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not able to hear the remarks of the gentleman and does not know whether that point of order was well taken or not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will state——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I protest against the character of the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will suspend and cease conversation. This is a request for unanimous consent, and all talk proceeds by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. TAWNEY. I object.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that objection comes too late. The Speaker asked if there was objection, and there was none.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Texas reserved the right to object. Now, as is usual in cases where unanimous consent is asked, gentlemen desire explanations, and by unanimous consent the explanation proceeds. It is quite in the power of any Member——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the Speaker allow me to correct him in that particular——

The SPEAKER. One moment. It is quite in the power of any Member at any time to object, and if the objection is made to further talk and not withdrawn, that is equivalent to an objection to consideration.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement of the position, as I understand it?

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps the Chair overlooked——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I insist I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. LACEY. I make the point of order that this bill is before the House by unanimous consent. The objection made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has been withdrawn, and that being withdrawn, the bill is before the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to state to the gentleman that I reserved the right to object.

Mr. LACEY. The record does not so show.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yielded to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] for the purpose of speaking to the bill, not for the purpose of attacking the Speaker. The gentleman from Missouri then began to speak in a manner which seemed to me quite out of order to other purposes than the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; I am not doing that.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The gentleman from Minnesota then objected to the tenor of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri. I submit that the bill is now before the House. The gentleman from Texas formally withdrew his objection, and that is the only objection that was made promptly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado will see, if he will stop and consider for a moment, that where legislation is had by unanimous consent, under the practice that prevails in the House, that consent can not be had by inference. The Chair must put the question for unanimous consent, and that unanimous consent must be given before the bill has rights for consideration.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Was not that done, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It was not done.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. As I understand the present situation, this bill was read and reported and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] then reserved the right to object, and interrogated me with reference thereto. Afterwards he withdrew his objection. The consideration of the bill then went on for some few minutes before any other step was taken adverse to its consideration. I raise the point that the right to object has been waived under these circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have to say to the gentleman from Colorado that in the judgment of the Chair that point is not well taken.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I was on my feet to reserve the right to object, and have an explanation.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent that may be had. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I had the floor in a regular way, and in what way do they get rid of me? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not have the floor for one second of time, under this kind of proceeding, if any Member objects.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, JUDICIAL, AND EXECUTIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 16472.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472, the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio, General KEIFER, be permitted to conclude the remarks which he was making on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. During the session of yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], having spoken one hour, had not concluded his remarks. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I have been much interested in the speeches made on the floor of this House on the subject of immigration. I find that there are a number of bills that have been introduced on that subject, and that the Committee on Immigration has devoted a great deal of time and labor and thought to an investigation of this subject. I believe that there is need for protection against the present immigration, at least, much of it that has come to our shores of recent years. This is a form of protection that I subscribe to. I do not believe in that protection that is alleged to be the result of the exercise of the taxing power. This is not protection; it is rather discrimination. If it protects any class or any interest, it is done at the expense of others, or rather at the expense of the whole people. The taxing power has been said by very high authority to be the power to destroy, but it certainly will not be claimed to be the power to create. Legislation can not create wealth. You can not add to the volume of wealth by the passage of laws. This is accomplished only by the exercise of brain and muscle; and this is necessarily so in the economy of nature, and has been since the divine injunction, that man shall live by the sweat of his brow.

But we have the right, and it is our duty as the lawmaking power, to pass laws to protect our people along certain lines. We have a right to resist invasion that threatens the peace and welfare of our country in whatever form it may come. We have a right to exercise the legislative power of this country to this end.

IMMIGRATION.

When we learn from the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration that the immigration to our shores for the year 1905 was 1,026,499 we are at once confronted with the importance of this question. Since the year 1820, the first date of a definite report of the immigration to this country, there has been an increasing tide of immigration, variable it is true, but generally increasing. It has caused apprehension in the minds of many of our people at various times as this tide has increased. Notably was this so in the fifties, but the amount of this immigration in former years was such as to make it a question of minor importance when compared to the present tide that is coming to our shores.

Whatever views may have obtained heretofore as to the necessity or righteousness of restricting immigration, the immigration of to-day has assumed such proportions that the conviction is forced upon us that if something is not done to restrict the character and amount of this immigration the welfare of our people will be jeopardized and our institutions if not imperiled will at least be beset with greater burdens in working out the great problems resting upon us in developing the social and civil fabric of the American Republic.

The importance of this question is emphasized when we come to consider the character and class of immigration that is at present coming to our country. An examination of the statistics shows that those coming up to the last twenty-five years were a class of people that were by nature possessed with instincts kindred to our own and with more aptitude for our institutions. They were in the main the same race of people to which we belong; they came from the land whence our fathers came; they were possessed of energy, courage, and lofty purpose, and in every way fitted to assimilate with our ideas and conditions and become valuable additions to our citizenship. The Englishman and Scotchman and the Irishman and the German and many others of northern Europe have been and still are welcome as we would welcome our own, for we descended from them, and we would be untrue to our own lineage not to give them welcome.

The statistics set out in the report of the Commissioner-General in his report portray with great force the situation that confronts the American people. It is not my purpose to set out these statistics, setting forth in detail the immigration to this country, but only to speak generally of the facts that they portray. In fact it is unnecessary for me to give a detailed statement of these figures or to set out these statistics in detail, since my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS], in his most able presentation of this question, has set these statistics out in such a clear and instructive manner that all the information necessary to an understanding of this question clearly appears in his concise and exhaustive presentation of them as they already appear in the RECORD as a part of his forcible and eloquent discussion of this subject. From these figures it appears that notwithstanding the enactment of several statutes restrictive and prohibitory of immigration the very evils they sought to check have increased rather than diminished even since the enactment of the general law on the subject in 1903. Since then the tide of immigration has increased, and the greatest portion of this tide has been of the class most undesirable.

Notwithstanding the interest this question has attracted from time to time, the first law passed by Congress restricting immigration was in 1875. Since that time several acts along this line have been passed, prominent among them the Chinese-exclusion act and the contract-labor law, and in 1903 a general law was passed.

The law of 1903 has been ineffective to an extent in avoiding the evils or the dangers that may come to us from an overflowing tide of immigration. It has done much to restrain and check the coming of those enumerated in section 2 of that act, yet the purpose and intention of that act has been accomplished only to a limited extent. The spirit for gain and greed for money is responsible for evasions of this law and for much of the undesirable immigration.

These laws have been avoided and violated in various ways, largely by efforts to secure contract laborers in violation of law and by steamship lines working through their agents to increase the number of immigrants for the purpose of transporting them, thus making money out of their coming.

Inducements offered by corporations for the purpose of getting cheaper laborers, which is a virtual defiance of our contract-labor law, has done much to render these laws ineffective.

The love for gain at all hazards, regardless of the laws and the interest of our people, has been a prolific source of much of this tide of the class of people so ill suited to our conditions and so unadaptable to our conditions and theories of government.

The report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration discloses the fact of movements on foot and schemes put in practice by foreign countries encouraging their people to come to America, not for the purpose of becoming citizens or uniting their destiny with ours, but for the purpose of gathering spoils, accumulating money, and carrying it back to their native land. In that report he says:

> Seventy-five per cent of the aliens who worked for three or four years in the industrial centers of our Eastern States return to their native land with an average saving of about $1,000, having spent not one penny more in this country than was absolutely necessary to keep life together according to their own frugal customs and habits. Every one of such returning aliens is, in a measure, an agent in inducing about ten others to do likewise. I repeat most emphatically that this sort of emigration is not only viewed with friendly eyes by some European governments, but is positively fostered and helped along. On this sort of traffic governments collect taxes and corrupt officials make money.

While the development of our material prosperity is not the first consideration by far, yet, even economically considered, there can be no advantage to our country from a body of laborers who remain as strangers among us and consume but few of our products and at the same time export the great bulk of their earnings to the countries from which they came.

There may be a financial benefit to certain property interests and manufacturers, who profit by their cheap labor; but the consideration that should shape our governmental policy should not regard special interests, or be directed wholly to our material development. Our aim should be more to develop men than to exploit lands and increase our industries.

No man measures up to the full standard of American citizenship who is not a home builder. The ideal citizen is the one who has a vine and fig tree of his own, and around this center has been developed in our country the noblest manhood and womanhood in Christendom. But these sojourners, who are here for a time only, to gather spoil, in a sense to prey upon us in that they take their earnings and their pay that is given in fair exchange for their labor and add it not to the wealth of our country, but hurry it back to their home country.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee for some evidence that the men coming in—the aliens who come to our shores—do not remain here and do not spend their earnings here. The gentleman makes the assertion that they take their earnings abroad and spend them there or that they send their earnings abroad. I would like to have the gentleman tell us where he obtains those particular facts, if they are facts.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, those facts I gather from the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration. We gather these statements from the report of Inspector Braun, from men who have been studying this question and at work as officials in this part of the Government service, and are presumably better informed as to the real condition of affairs than anybody else. They make these statements, and I take it this is as good authority as can be offered on the subject.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the reports of the steamship companies show that something like nearly 325,000 passengers went back in the steerage last year, and does not that fact alone indicate that a very large proportion of these people do return to the country of their origin?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that to be true, and I think the conclusion stated by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is necessarily true.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] or the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] inform this House what evidence they have that those 325,000 who returned were immigrants who landed here in the last year or two, and if the number did not include those who had been here for perhaps twenty years? Will the gentleman kindly give us some evidence on that point?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, it does not matter that they come within the last few months or within the last twenty years. They have come and they have returned; whether they have come recently or some years ago does not make any difference. They may have stayed here but one year or two years gathering the substance of our people to the extent they could, by means of their economical ways and methods, to send to the land of their nativity. They may have stayed here ten years or longer. The longer they stayed, if it was to gather our substance and carry it away, the worse it is for us.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would also like to ask the gentlemen whether they have any evidence or proof of the fact that those 325,000 who returned were all aliens or men who had landed on our shores from foreign soil? Did that number not include those who had become American citizens who went abroad—men who made their money under our beneficent laws and went abroad to spend that money and enjoy it in visiting their old country?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, that class of passengers to which the gentleman from New York refers do not, as a rule, go as steerage passengers. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, one other question, and then I think I am through. Does the State from which the gentleman comes, and particularly the district that he represents—the Fifth Tennessee—need men, and especially unskilled laborers or agricultural laborers; and if so, how can he get them except by immigration?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in my State and in my section we could give employment to a larger number of laborers than we have now, perhaps. Every honest, industrious laborer in our country can find employment and at remunerative wages. We might give employment to a number more than we have, but I do not understand it to be the chief end and aim of man or of any country to employ all the laborers possible at any given time. It is not necessary that all the material should be developed at once or that all the labor that could be handled should be brought into operation at once. We have proceeded in my section along conservative lines. We have developed our industries gradually. We have populated our country gradually, but steadily. There is no decrease in population there. The birth rate is keeping up. I repeat that we can perhaps employ more, but we do not need to import them in large numbers. Good people coming to us from any country are quite welcome, and they can find profitable employment there, but we are not specially suffering for want of more people.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would ask the gentleman if he has any aliens now in his State or district, or any people of alien race?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have an alien race there, as a result, to say the least of it, of a great national mistake made in the earlier days of this Republic—I might say a national wrong, but for which the people of my country or the South were not responsible originally. And we are suffering to-day as a consequence and as a result of this national blunder. The system that was fostered and built up in our country many years ago by the bringing here of this race was wrong and can be viewed now as nothing else than a great national error. I want to say further that while we have this alien race among us we are equal to the occasion. We are solving the difficulties that confront us with this alien race under very difficult conditions at the first I grant you, but we are able to meet them and we are maintaining our institutions, we are caring for these people, we are giving them protection under the law, we are teaching them to understand their real status and know their real rights as citizens, and they have confidence in us that they will be protected as such; but, sir, it will not improve conditions in my country where this alien race is to bring other discordant elements there, and for other irritating influences to be put in operation. Not at all; let us solve that question ourselves as best we may. We can do it; we are doing it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow a question? What are the principal industries in your district; in what are your people principally engaged?

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, sir, my country is strictly an agricultural country. The principal industry is farming.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to say, if you will allow me, that I am a farmer myself.

Mr. HOUSTON. You look like a good man, and you are probably a good farmer.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think the great difficulty in this country is to get labor for agricultural purposes. It simply can not be done. I know it is in the State of Maryland, where I own two farms.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is simply a statement; the difficulty is to secure farm laborers, and I take it it is so all over the United States, in your district as well as other sections of the country.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, we are getting along fairly well. There is no stress upon us along that line. We are raising farmers and farm workingmen, and the more we can keep our own sons on the farm the better it is for them and for our country.

In addition to those prohibited in section 2 of the act of 1903, should we not take steps toward limiting the number that are to come? The vicious and the criminal class are a confessed menace to any civilized country. Large numbers of a class of people unadapted to an understanding of our institutions and unfitted to an assimilation with our national instincts of character will become a menace to our institutions whenever that number is large enough. What think you of our capacity to absorb and educate to our ways and notions of government 1,065,000 a year? Does this not approach the danger line? Is it not a warning to us that troubles are gathering that call for action to protect our nationality and to prevent hazard to the welfare of our own people? At the ratio of increase for the past five years it has been estimated that we would reach a density of population in the next hundred and thirty-six years that would equal that of China proper, which is considered the limit of the density of population. However this may be, it is far better to build up a nation strong in civic and domestic virtue and happiness than to overcrowd and densify our population. On this point the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration says:

What will be the effect if the present phenomenal immigration continues is a question that is constantly being asked. With regard more particularly to quantity the question may be answered by the following illustration: China proper is the thickly populated portion of the Chinese Empire and is the country popularly thought of as practically representing the limit of density of population. At the present rate of immigration, say 1,000,000 per annum, and the present rate of natural increase (14.66 per cent per decade) the United States would reach the density of China proper in about four generations, or, more particularly, in one hundred and thirty-six years, at which time we would have a population of 950,000,000. This is in no sense an estimate of future population; it is simply an answer to the mathematical problem as to how long it will take to reach a density of population equal to the estimated density of China proper, with an annual immigration of 1,000,000, at the present rate of natural increase, and represents the present pace.

Mr. Chairman, this has ever been a hospitable land. We have received the stranger within our gates and treated him as a friend and brother; but the law of self-preservation is the first law of nature, and whenever the welfare of our national family is imperiled we should protect it from the invasion of every danger in whatever guise it should come, even to the turning away of our own fellow-man. We should be generous to the stranger, but he that does not provide for his own household is worse than an infidel. I believe in missionary work, and I subscribe to the practice of giving our substance and time and labor to the betterment of mankind in all lands and among all races, to their elevation, their civilization, and their christianization; but let us preserve our own national household and cherish and build up our own superb citizenship unto the full measure of its glory.

From an examination of these statistics that I have alluded to we see that the immigration that is coming to us from those countries of northern and western Europe, more nearly akin to us and more congenial to our ideas of government, has not increased, but rather diminished, within the last few years, and that those coming from the countries of southern and eastern Europe, that are less in accord with our form of government and more difficult of assimilation with our ideas of civilization, are largely on the increase. The most desirable are coming in smaller numbers and the less desirable are coming in far greater numbers.

The last report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration (pp. 109 and 110) says:

A change in the source of immigration, it will be seen, however, commenced about 1882, and has assumed enormous proportions during the past eight years, until now 70 per cent of our immigration comes from Slavic and Iberic countries of southern and eastern Europe, 700,000 having arrived from those countries during the past year, among whom were great numbers of illiterate aliens of different races, customs, and standards.

Further on he says:

With the continuance of present conditions, it will be seen, the time will come when the new element, containing 70 per cent from southeastern Europe, will outnumber the old, which eventually can hardly mean less than a changed nationality.

So, Mr. Chairman, in viewing this question to-day it presents in no respect the aspect that it did in former years. In the earlier days of our country those that came here were indeed our own kith and kin—of the same blood and race. They entered into fellowship and communion with our own people, and were among the best and bravest of the pioneers of our civilization. But the bulk of those that come to-day enter into no communion with our own people in a social or civil way. They are isolated, or, rather, segregated, in societies apart from us. While among us, they are not of us, and add nothing to the great community of interest of the nation's welfare.

If they were to mix with our people to a large extent, it would be the mixing of incongruous elements and the formation of a heterogeneous society in which American ideals would not prosper.

So, viewed in any aspect, most of the present-day immigration is not beneficial, but damaging to America, and should be checked by every just and righteous method.

This report of the Commissioner-General discloses the fact, before mentioned, that this undesirable immigration is largely due to the methods of steamship companies and their agents that ply their unlawful practice of getting immigrants for the gain of transportation. This is a species of graft that they have employed, another instance of special interests seeking their profit at the expense of the great mass of the people.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do.

Mr. GOULDEN. How would you check that, may I be allowed to ask?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will come to that a little later—to that very question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to assure the gentleman I am merely asking for information. Does the gentleman hold that immigration from southern Italy, the Jewish immigration from Austria, and the Slavic immigration also from Austria is the most undesirable immigration?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will answer that by saying this, that so far as I am able to judge—and I confess I am not thoroughly acquainted with these peoples and their customs—I think it is less desirable than the character of immigration that came to this country in the first fifty or seventy-five years of our Republic, and I want to say right here that I do not take to the idea of excluding a race per se. I do not take to the idea of putting a ban on any nationality or race of people. That idea does not find favor in my mind. [Applause.] However, in the exercise of our preference as to who should come we must prefer the best. I will say we do know that those who come from northern Europe are more in accord with us, more adapted, I will say, to our institutions, more acquainted with us, and can more readily, I think, become proper citizens of this Republic. I, however, say I do not take to the idea of putting any ban on any special race or nationality; however, circumstances may justify even that, if it comes to a matter of self-preservation.

The question of restricting immigration is a grave one and one calling for the exercise of judicious and conservative statesmanship, because of our duties to mankind, as well as our duty to our own nation, and we should approach the consideration of it with a conservative regard for the rights of our fellowman as well as our own, but when we come to consider it in that broader sense of our relation to our fellow-men we are justified in the conclusion that it is our duty to first of all pursue that course that is best for our own national family. It may be said that this involves a degree of selfishness, but patriotism demands that we should be selfish enough to love and serve our own country first and that the welfare of our people should be first considered.

Mr. Jefferson, in his notes on Virginia, in speaking of the question of immigration—and, mind you, the immigration that came at that time was of the same blood and stock as the American people—said:

The present desire of America is to produce a rapid population by as great importation of foreigners as possible, but is this founded in good policy? Are there no inconveniences to be thrown into the scale against the advantages expected from the multiplication of numbers by the importation of foreigners? It is for the happiness of those united in society to harmonize as much as possible in matters which they must of necessity transact together. Civil government being the sole object of forming societies, its administration must be conducted by common consent.

Every species of government has its specific principles. Ours perhaps are more peculiar than any other in the universe. It is a composition of the freest principles of the English constitution with others derived from natural right and reason. To this nothing can be more opposed than the maxims of absolute monarchies; yet from such we expect the greatest number of immigrants. They will bring with them the principles of the government they have imbibed in early youth, or, if able to throw them off, it will be in exchange for an unbounded licentiousness, passing, as is usual, from one extreme to another. It would be a miracle with them to stop precisely at the point of temperate liberty.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I stop in this quotation long enough to say that the history of our present day demonstrates the truth of this, that may now be regarded as a prophecy from Thomas Jefferson. Many of the troubles that have grown up have been from the reckless disregard of the rights of others that have been exhibited by this class of aliens who have been banded and aggregated together in many of our cities. Some of the serious troubles we have had come right from that source, and have come from this very spirit of license to which he refers. It would be a miracle——

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman state any specific instances which have occurred from the immigration of the last twenty-five years of the evils which it appeared Jefferson foretold?

Mr. HOUSTON. What is your question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. As I understood your quotation from Jefferson, he prophesied that in the future there would be trouble because of admitting these aliens who came from monarchies?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Do I understand the gentleman's remark to be limited in its scope or to refer to aliens who came to us from the beginning?

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, what part of my remarks?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Your last remark.

Mr. HOUSTON. I say we have instances in this country that have fulfilled this prophecy; that we have had aliens coming to this country who seem to understand liberty to mean license, who have caused serious troubles. I might refer you to the trouble we had in New Orleans in the last few years; to the recent conspiracy to assassinate Governor Pennypacker, of Pennsylvania, and Governor Patterson, of Ohio; to the Haymarket riot, and a number of other troubles in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. To Czolgosz.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But he was born in Indiana.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. He was of foreign parentage.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have not yet got to the point where I would call a man born in Indiana an alien.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not mean that he was not born in the United States, but his family had not been in this country long.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will go on with this quotation from Jefferson. It is from the prophet and from the gospel of Democracy.

Their principles with their language they will transmit to their children. In proportion to their number they will share with us in the legislation. They will infuse into it their spirit, warp and bias its direction, and render it a heterogeneous, incoherent, distracted mass.

And further on he says:

Is it not safer to await with patience for the attainment of population desired or expected? May not our Government be more homogeneous, more peaceable, more reliable?

The pertinency of these questions apply with double force now when we come to consider the character of the immigration of the present day as compared with that to which Mr. Jefferson alluded. And I shall make another quotation from the paper that is edited and directed by W. J. Bryan, a disciple of Jefferson, and one of the soundest living exponents of the principles of free government. [Applause.]

I quote as follows:

The question is whether we are going to build up a strong, independent, upright, and patriotic people, and develop a civilization that will exert a helpful influence on all the world or whether we are going to be a greedy, grasping nation, forgetful of high ideals and concerned only in the making of money. Aside from present-day pretexts, Chinese immigration is defended by those who believe that a universal brotherhood requires us to welcome to our shores all peoples of all lands. This is the sentimental argument advanced in favor of Chinese immigration. There is no more reason why we should construe brotherhood to require the admission of all people to our country than there is that we should construe brotherhood to require the dissolution of family ties. The family is a unit; it is the place where character and virtue and usefulness are developed, and from the family a good or evil influence emanates. It is not necessary nor even wise that the family environment should be broken up or that all who desire entrance should be admitted to the family circle. In a larger sense, a nation is a family; it is the center for the cultivation of national character, national virtue, and national usefulness. A nation is under no obligation to the outside world to admit anybody or anything that would injuriously affect the national family. In fact, it is under obligation to itself not to do so. The influence of the United States will be more potent for good if we remain a homogeneous nation, with all citizens in full sympathy with all other citizens.

Mr. Chairman, to furnish a home for the oppressed and an asylum for the unfortunate of every land is beautiful in sentiment and commendable in deed were we able to do so without sacrificing our own. When we approach that point we must stop and, if necessary, exercise the right of self-defense. At this point I want to call your attention to a statement in the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration (p. 48):

INDUCEMENTS TO IMMIGRATION.

The figures presented by the statistical reports for the year under consideration have now attained such dimensions as to challenge painstaking consideration of their import. It is impossible that such an influx can fail to produce material effects upon the institutions of this country, as it is doing upon the population. What such effects will probably be in the long run it is not within the proper scope of this report to discuss, but attention is drawn to the subject to show that, if it is a public desire to establish some reasonable limitation on immigration, some restriction that will materially lessen the volume of the current until by actual experience assurance is secured of the safety of the institutions of the country under such an unexampled strain, it is to make a new departure in legislating upon alien immigration. It is no longer sufficient to close the door upon certain classes, manifestly undesirable additions to any community. The aliens who are forbidden admission to the United States by section 2 of act of March 3, 1903, are as objectionable to the communities in which they were born and of which they have always formed a part as they are to us. It can not be denied, however, that of such as are not expressly excluded by law there are many aliens enter into the United States who, if not individually open to objection on the score of physical, mental, or moral defects admitted of all men, are yet of such totally alien, if not repugnant, character and genius as to raise a doubt whether they will in the present or the succeeding generation become assimilated in customs and ideals to the people of this country. This view has found expression as yet in legislation affecting aliens of but one race. That solitary instance, however, is a recognition of the principle that the public welfare at this stage of the world's development demands the intervention of the law-making branch of the Government to prevent an unrestricted irruption of elements hostile to our institutions, if not incapable of comprehending them.

The difficulties and embarrassments that have been experienced in the administration of that unique legislation, however, suggests the expediency of first attempting by other means to check the enormous and miscellaneous immigration now pouring practically without check as to numbers into our seaports and across our land borders. The Government has control, through its authority over our ports, of transportation agencies by which aliens are brought to this country, and unless it be conceded that our commercial interest is paramount to all other considerations and clothes those great corporations which are its vehicles with a sanctity of right which it is impious to question or restrict, the natural and sensible recourse from the present dangers is to place some reasonable restriction upon them.

Mr. Chairman, the argument is made that the demand for labor to develop our great resources is such that we should encourage all this immigration; but, Mr. Chairman, the development of our material resources is not the chief end and aim of man or of this nation. The building, developing, and elevating of our social and civil fabric in its purity and grandeur is more than adding to the volume of our wealth; more important it is to develop man and society and free government and maintain them in their purity than to build up our natural wealth. In the course of time we will have peopled this continent; a population will come under the blessings of Providence the offspring of our own race and people that will fill the vacant places and develop and build up our resources. Our population may become so dense that the struggle for existence will be difficult. It is true that the science and ingenuity of man will develop new resources, will bring the forces of nature into operation to supply the wants of man, but there is a limit to all things. Already we hear talk of the physical degeneration of our race. Among the causes enumerated for this is the overcrowding of people with its attending evils. It has been shown that the death rate increases in startling proportions wherever condensation takes place. I can see no reason why we should hasten the day for a struggle for existence to take the place of natural progress and development. I know the commercial spirit of this age; but I maintain that the rapid accumulation and building up of our national wealth is not the paramount object of this nation, but rather the developing of a virtuous, contented, and happy people. [Applause.]

I confess I do not like some of the methods suggested to restrict immigration. The head tax is distasteful to my mind; it is ineffective, too, in preventing immigration for the reason that steamship companies who by their agents and various methods work up these alien immigrants from other countries will pay this head tax, and it is but a lessening of their profits rather than a restriction of immigration. It may be a frown on honest poverty. The man without the money to pay the head tax might be as honest and as capable of developing into a good citizen as his more fortunate brother who possesses the head tax. The poor man is not only entitled to every consideration that his more fortunate brother is, but deserves our sympathy more, and may possess, as before stated, the elements of manhood and good citizenship.

The educational test is not satisfactory, because it is in a sense unjust to the illiterate, and his illiteracy may be no evidence of his depravity or inferiority.

The work of transportation lines and steamship companies and other agencies of our own people, working up immigration for the mere gain of their passage fare, is one of the worst evils to contend with. These and their coworkers, who are endeavoring to evade the contract-labor law, are the agencies that bring us the worst class of immigrants. The man of energy and courage, that strikes out on his own nerve to seek his fortune in a new land, is much more likely to make a desirable citizen of his adopted country than those that are herded up like dumb driven cattle and brought here by men just for the purpose of exploiting their business. The argument has been made, based upon the statement of Government officials, that a very large amount of the immigration is the result of the work of those seeking to evade the contract-labor law. If these unjust and unlawful methods could be stopped, we would be relieved of the most undesirable parts of this immigration, and it will check those that are coming in largest numbers, according to the report of the immigration inspector. If this traffic in immigration, practiced by grafters and spoilsmen, in bringing a class regardless of their character could be stopped, much would be done toward solving this question. Then we might still welcome the honest man—the poor man, illiterate though he be—if he is one who realizes that he is made in the image of his Maker, and comes to us inspired by a love for liberty and a desire to learn our institutions and become a part of our nation. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOULDEN. When you speak of the "immigration inspector" to whom do you allude?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am talking about Mr. Braun—Marcus A. Braun.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman is aware that that party has resigned; that he was discredited by the Department of Commerce and Labor; that his statements are greatly exaggerated, if not entirely untrue?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not aware that his statements have been discredited by anybody.

Mr. GOULDEN. So I am informed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand he has got in some trouble.

Mr. GOULDEN. He has resigned under fire.

Mr. HOUSTON. He has resigned; but the facts that he sets forth in his report have not been met or proven to be untrue.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think they are untrue, largely.

Mr. HOUSTON. This large influx that has been instanced by these officials comes as a result of the evasion of this law, according to their statements, and it does seem to me that their statement is the best authority we have so far. That law ought to be enforced; if it is insufficient it ought to be amended. It ought to be strengthened; severer penalties ought to be attached to it [applause], and if by this means we can stop this part of the present-day immigration, that would go a long way in affording the needed relief.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, of the difficulties which confront us when we undertake to control the action of these transportation lines and steamship companies in the great tide that they are bringing here. It is a difficult matter, as is well known in this House and in this Government, to regulate and control transportation companies. That question in a different form has been agitating this House, and is now agitating the other end of this Capitol, and has been since the meeting of this Congress. But I believe that in the exercise of our proper legislative functions we can pass laws to control and regulate transportation lines and foreign and interstate commerce; and if that is done much will be accomplished toward holding immigration within proper limits.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT. I see that the gentleman has given considerable thought to this question. I would like to ask whether my colleague thinks it would be possible or practicable to adopt a system of examination at the American consulates before the immigrant comes here? Has my colleague studied that phase of the question?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will say that I have studied that feature of the question as best I could with the light before me, and it occurred to me at first that that would be a most feasible way to prevent and restrict a great deal of immigration, but, upon further investigation, the difficulties of putting that into practical operation are very considerable. If, however, it could be done, it would reach the very point where succor is needed most, and I hope that some method of that sort may be established and put on foot by which we can have an inspection and an examination at the the foreign ports before they start to this country. I hope that the committee may evolve some method of that sort that will give relief.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in the method of selecting the best, as far as we can. I believe that we should restrict and restrain those that are not so good, as far as we can. After an investigation of this subject I am aware that there is much difficulty attending this legislation—much difficulty to procure legislation that will accomplish this end—but I hope that this committee that is giving so much labor and thought to this question may report a measure that will produce the relief that the country stands so much in need of, to my mind. Let us select the best to the extent that we can. Let us restrain the undesirable to the extent that we can, and if these methods fail, then this nation must meet the question fairly and squarely and close our doors when it becomes necessary for our own preservation. If we can not control the actions of steamship companies in bringing immigrants from foreign lands, we can meet their vessels at our own ports and deny them entrance; and whenever the tide of immigration becomes so great as to be a menace to our country, then we should, I say, restrict immigration from all lands and all countries, if it is necessary to protect our own people. That is our duty. We have a right to protect ourselves against an invasion of any kind, either an armed force or one coming in the guise of peace. We have a right to quarantine against pestilence and disease, and it is right to do so. We have a right to exercise every safeguard as a nation to protect our people from any evil that threatens us whenever that protection is needed; and, I say, if these restrictive methods, these selective methods, fail, then we must meet the question and adopt such measures as will preserve our own nation and its best welfare. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, perhaps a trifle out of the usual order, I should like to have the attention of the committee while I discuss some things that relate to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I shall not detain the committee for any great length of time in any event, but a little bit later I want to call attention to what seems to me to be a prevailing abuse, and that is the apparently irresistible tendency upon the part of the legislative body not only to increase salaries injudiciously, but to continue to increase the personnel of the service of the United States.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and the gentleman in charge of this bill also, indicating that they had begun to discover conditions that were not entirely agreeable in connection with the service of the Government in that regard. I very heartily approve the suggestions of the gentlemen representing the committee in a general way in relation to the superannuation of the Government employees, and I am perfectly willing to follow them in any reasonable and appropriate legislative manner in correcting what may be to some extent an abuse. Yet, at the same time, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the analysis upon which I am about to engage a little later will demonstrate that the superannuation of employees is by no means the greatest evil under which we labor. In my judgment, sir, the superannuation of employees is a trifle compared with unnecessary and unrequired men in the Government service.

Now, it is not my purpose to discuss that question even in detail, or to allude to any particular official, either by way of the creation of an office or by the increase of salary. It is my desire to present the concrete practical situation, in order that the chairmen of the various committees and that the House may appreciate the condition into which we have developed along these lines.

Of course, we all full well appreciate the practical situation, that it is almost impossible for us to turn about anywhere without being asked, not only for the creation, perhaps, of an office in the Government service, but for the increase of a salary; and these applications are very difficult to withstand. Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that this subject, in my judgment, has not received the attention to which its magnitude entitles it. The civil-service salary list is to-day about $133,913,363, and that by no means includes the charge upon the public Treasury of the public officials in the public service.

I want to say now, on the threshold of what I have to say, that the President of the United States, apprehending this situation and realizing as he apparently has—although in the immense multitude of details involved in the discharge of his duties it is unreasonable to expect him to have a knowledge of details—the President, realizing the condition connected with the public service, has appointed what is known as the Keep commission, which is intended to regulate and investigate three or four bureaus for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the service now being rendered by those bureaus can not be rendered by less men, at a less expense, in a more economical way, and without the possible duplication of the Government service.

I asked the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] if that did not tend in the direction indicated by the suggestions of the committee, and he rather blew that Commission aside as if it was a matter of no consequence whatever.

Now, I do not know what that Commission up to date has accomplished, but I do wish to say that, in my judgment, the appointment of that committee on the part of the President of the United States, without legislative suggestion or reminder, was a step in the right direction, and I believe that that Commission to-day, Mr. Chairman, has accomplished valuable and useful results with very trifling expense to the Treasury of the United States.

Now, that is a step, I say, in the right direction. I do not wish to be understood, in the suggestions I am going to make, as being opposed to the increase of salaries or to the creation of offices, because I am not, under proper condition. I am prepared now to vote, notwithstanding these conditions, for an increase of any salary where the increase is reasonable and fairly required, no matter who the officer may be. I am prepared to vote and sustain the committee in any offices necessary for the proper discharge of the executive functions of this Government. And yet, at the same time, I think this committee will be satisfied when I give them this analysis that we must exercise very much more conservative care and caution than has been exercised heretofore.

I am going to call attention to the analysis of the situation from 1889 until now. In 1888 and 1897 we had some legislation that required the clerks of the appropriations committees on the part of the House and the Senate to report an analysis of the appropriation bills for each session at the close of the session.

These clerks made these reports. I want to stop here now to say that I have had very material assistance in the investigation of the question that I am now discussing by the very efficient and valuable clerk of the Appropriations Committee of this House—Mr. Courts—one of the most—I won't say the most efficient, because that would be an invidious distinction as to the other clerks—but I do not hesitate to say that he is one of the most valuable and efficient servants that this House of Representatives has. He is an absolute encyclopedia upon the fiscal operations of this Government. I have had occasion to ask him a great many questions, and I have never found him wanting in any particular. [Applause.]

Now, in the discharge of this very important duty—and, by the way, I doubt very much, so far as practical results are concerned, whether any member of this House or Senate has availed himself of the information disclosed by these men as a result of this statute—under these statutes these gentlemen have collected with these clerks and prior clerks since 1888 these statistics and summaries, and one of the items is "New offices created, and salaries therefor;" another item is "Offices, salaries of which have been omitted, with the amount of reduction." Another item is "Offices, the salaries of which have been increased, with the amount of such increase." Another is "Offices, the salaries of which have been reduced, with the amount of such reduction."

Now, I will give the House the benefit of the work of these gentlemen. Since 1889—1889 being for the fiscal year ending in 1890—offices created aggregated a charge on the Treasury of $1,469,779. The offices omitted were $135,172, showing a net increase in 1889 of $1,334,607.

Now, I will not go into the details, but I will give the results, because, unfortunately, in every year from 1889 up to 1905 there has been an immense increase, and I will read them. I will put this list in the RECORD. In 1890 the increase was $2,686,229. In 1891 an increase of $2,264,234; in 1892, $375,919; in 1893, $1,033,233; in 1894, $1,044,606; in 1895, $1,621,176; in 1896, $886,095; in 1897, $1,057,366; in 1898, $55,557,906.

Of course, the Members will understand that that was the war year, involving extraordinary and unusual expenditure and a necessary large increase.

In 1899, $13,953,096; in 1900, $5,132,663; in 1901, $21,955,221; in 1902, $7,165,272; in 1903, $14,330,297; in 1904, $14,306,147, and in 1905, $10,450,695.

A statement more in detail is as follows:

New offices created and the salaries thereof, and offices the salaries of which have been omitted, with the amount of the reduction, prepared in compliance with an act approved October 19, 1888.

[Statutes at Large, vol. 25, p. 587.]

| Year. | Created. | Omitted. | Net increase. |

| 1905 | 11,331,039 | 880,344 | 10,450,695 |

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not a record of which any one of us should feel entirely proud. Every one of these creations of office and offices omitted have been reported to this House from time to time by some committee who examined these questions. I do not purpose criticising the committees, but I do wish to suggest that these facts are such—and I am going to give an average in just a moment—that should require the committees before they report these bills creating these offices to examine with great care these departments for the purpose of advising us whether these creations of office are necessary. The average net increase per year from 1889 to 1897 was $1,367,052. The average net increase per year from 1902 to 1905—four years—was $11,563,102. In other words, in four years we have created offices in appropriation bills to the extent of $46,242,408. Now, I think the time has come when the committees and the House should halt upon the threshold of this question. I desire to say this: That there have been unusual expenditures during the last four or five years that to a certain extent will account for some of these offices created. We have had the rural free delivery. I have not been able, because it is partly beyond the power of any one man to investigate all the details involved in this situation, to give to the House or to the Committee of the Whole the aggregate amount of increased charge upon the public Treasury by the rural free delivery. I believe in the rural free delivery, so far as that is concerned. I may say right here that the creation of offices in the postal service for this very last year carried in the appropriation bill ending July 1, 1906—that the balance was $2,439,300, and in a large degree I have no doubt that was due to the rural free-delivery service.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the information of the gentleman from Maine that the rural free-delivery service is $11,767,678.04.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That should be charged up against the $46,242,408?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], I believe, is the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; I believe I have the honor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it was my privilege to call attention, in a general way, to the very matters of which the gentleman is complaining and to suggest that these committees should be vitalized and should investigate these expenditures in the several Departments of the Government, in order that thereby the appropriating committees would be able to tell whether the expenditures were unnecessary and excessive or not; but there are here the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that have charge of nearly all of the appropriations of the Government. Does the gentleman think it is possible for these great committees to not only pass upon what is necessary to expend for the future, but to make that exhaustive examination into the expenditures of all of the nine great Departments of the Government especially to determine whether there has been waste in the past fiscal year in these Departments or not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will say very frankly that I do not know, but I doubt whether it is. I have not undertaken yet, and I said distinctly that I did not undertake, to criticise the committees, although I do say that these offices that have been created have been created by the committees reporting these appropriation bills. If the gentleman desires me to be entirely frank, it seems to me that when the committees report bills creating offices they ought to be able to be certain that the public service requires it. It may be that the public service requires to-day about eight times the creation of offices it did from 1889 to 1897. I do not say that it does not. I have not been able to find anybody—and I have made careful inquiry—that can give me reasons for this large increase, except in the line of the rural free delivery and two other Departments. And I desire to call attention to a new bureau which we created, making the Census Bureau permanent. We have also created the Department of Commerce and Labor. That has also made a very large extra charge upon the Treasury. Now, I have no doubt that the rural free-delivery service and the making permanent the Census Bureau, which is perfectly legitimate, I believe, and also the making of this Department of Commerce and Labor, has to a large degree been responsible for a great deal of this apparent large expense, but I doubt if they account for all of the increases.

Now, a little further in relation to the Committee on Expenditures——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion in that connection before he passes from that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I take it I will be sustained by the record when I say that in no instance has an additional clerk been allowed or an additional office been created without the head of a Department or bureau or division coming before the committee and explaining the absolute necessity for the additional force in his branch, but unfortunately it is beyond the power of those four committees, charged as they are with the primary duty of determining how much is needed for the next fiscal year, to make that critical examination into the work done in every branch of the public service, which now costs approximately eight hundred millions a year, and to know whether or not they need this additional force or that somebody already employed in the public service is not doing his full share of work. The work of ascertaining the amount needed for the future is so great as to preclude sufficient examination by the same committees of the wisdom of past expenditures. Now, if your committee and the other committees of like character would assume the burden of ascertaining the wisdom of past expenditures and furnish the light of that information to these appropriating committees, you would greatly aid these committees in the discharge of their duties and enable them to discharge them much better and with greater economy. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman's statement can not embarrass the gentleman now addressing the committee, because until within the last few weeks he has not been in a position to do this very useful work.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I had no thought of seeking to embarrass him, and if the gentleman had listened——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have listened.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. To my remarks on the fortification bill he would know I acquitted these committees of all responsibility for this failure to investigate the Departments, but urged that the committees be vitalized for the future and hereafter do the work which properly belongs to them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, if I understand the gentleman, it is this: The gentleman's proposition is the Committee on Appropriations have unloaded this responsibility on committees heretofore known as "innocuous" committees——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That these committees not being vitalized—the committees on expenditures in the various Departments—that because of that these small committees have never done anything heretofore, and I do not know that they have. I am now chairman of one, and I will take the advice of the gentleman and give it very ample consideration; but, as I now understand it, it is because the committees on expenditures in the various Departments have not heretofore made an investigation and relieved the Committee on Appropriations of a great burden they have been continually reporting new offices again and again, and now under the shelter of this proposition——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. May I——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me finish. And they now shelter themselves under the proposition, they have talked to somebody about it, and the man stated that such office was necessary, or such an increase was necessary. That is what I understand to be the substance of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I acquitted the gentleman's committee, and I trust the gentleman wants to be fair with the other committees. I stated these appropriating committees, in my judgment, exhausted every possible effort upon their part to ascertain what expenditures were necessary for the future, took testimony, had extensive hearings, but it was impracticable since the expenditures of the Government had arisen to $800,000,000 a year for those few committees to make as exhaustive an examination of the past as ought to be made, and therefore the hour had come when committees like that of which the gentleman from Maine is chairman ought to be vitalized and ought to come to the assistance of the appropriating committees and ought to furnish information to them that would assist them in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I want to say this in fairness to the gentleman. I think the gentleman states the question from the view point of his committee fairly.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department made an effort a few years ago, when the Department was rife with corruption, to make an investigation of the character indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, and did not this House refuse to permit the investigation of the expenditures in the Post-Office Department?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am not able to state about that, but I presume the gentleman making the statement knows the basis upon which he makes it. I do not personally know what the fact is, but I want to say——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is it not a fact that was only done when the Department of Justice was investigating the delinquencies of the Post-Office Department to which the gentleman from Texas refers? Was not the action of the House taken because the House did not want to embarrass the Department of Justice when it was after those people in a criminal way?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have not any doubt the gentleman from West Virginia states the situation correctly. Personally I have no recollection about the details. There is no controversy between myself and the gentleman from Iowa so far as his committee is concerned. I relieve it so far as I am concerned of any desire to criticise. I have not any doubt he states exactly the situation. Now, if the solution of this really is these committees which have fallen into innocuous desuetude; if the real and proper solution is for these committees to make an investigation, that is one thing. I am ready to aid in that.

On the other hand, there is no doubt that this is the situation which we ought to take care of. I think that the gentlemen on the various appropriation committees are better qualified, with their knowledge of the subject, to suggest the proper method. If the gentleman suggests a commission to ascertain what the conditions are, why that would be another proposition. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was only going to inquire, if the Appropriations Committee can not do it—they have not got the time to do it and can not do it—and the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department can not, and you are all acquitting each other of any negligence and issuing bills of health to each other, what are you talking about? [Laughter.] What are you here for? [Renewed laughter.]

A MEMBER. Where are you at?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will first answer it. In the first place, I will say, so far as I am concerned, I have made no assertion that we can not do it, but a gentleman on the Appropriation Committee suggests that. I suggest this to the gentleman from Ohio, that I have said that if the solution of this is to vitalize these committees that, so far as I am concerned, I will try to help vitalize them. I think that should satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That puts you all right.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman does not feel embarrassed about that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a double bill of health.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Precisely; that leaves us without any criticism whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I was about to say that the rule is not specific in requiring your committee to make investigation. It is very doubtful under its language whether you have the right to do anything but to consider legislation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Whether we have the right to.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Whether you have the right to. There is no provision of the rule requiring you to do it, in my judgment, under the rule, after a careful examination of it. Now, this is not a reflection upon these Committees on Expenditures in the Departments. It is not a reflection upon any other committee, except as it may be a reflection on us that we can not do everything in the limited time we have. It is impossible for them to make a sufficiently careful scrutiny on all these expenditures in the nine Departments, and somebody else ought to do it, and furnish the result to those committees primarily charged with the duty, not of ascertaining how the money has been spent, but how much must be appropriated for the next fiscal year.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So that the Committees on Expenditures are acquitted, because the gentleman says they have never had any power in connection with this question. I have just stated, and now the gentleman from Iowa has stated practically the same thing with reference to the various appropriations committees, and all I said was that I wanted to call attention to these facts in order that all these committees, so far as they can, shall give a more careful scrutiny to these propositions when they come before them. That is all I did say and that is all I do say. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I belong to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and have for the past six years. During all that time there has never been a bill submitted to the committee. Now, I desire to know from the gentleman how it is possible for us to pass upon anything unless it is sent to us under the rules of the House?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It may not be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas (continuing). We have no right to investigate anything. Of course, I am a member of the minority, and we can not originate anything, and I would like to know the means by which we are to enter into this investigation.

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask the gentleman if there is anything in the rule which would prohibit a Member of the House from introducing a bill and having it referred to the committee, if he is looking around for jurisdiction.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am a member of the minority.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that the law requires the heads of the Departments to annually submit to Congress an itemized statement of the expenditures of all the appropriations, and is not that statement presented in the form of a document and sent to all of these committees on expenditures of the various Departments, and has any one of these committees ever taken the trouble to examine these statements?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have never been called together, up to date, I believe. [Laughter.] I do not understand why, unless it is because——

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman ever seen one of the reports submitted to his Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I never have. The matter has never been called to our attention.

Mr. TAWNEY. As a matter of fact, there is an itemized statement furnished to the House by the head of each of the Departments of all the expenditures and all the appropriations that are made, including permanent appropriations; and they are referred under the rules of the House to the Committees on Expenditures of the various Departments referred to.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Maine object to my reading from the rule a statement of the jurisdiction of these committees?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask how the minority of a committee can call the committee together when the chairman does not do it, the chairman, under the rules of the House, having control of the committee through the majority?

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman ever called for one of these reports, or inquired in his committee room whether they were there or not?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can read the Book of Estimates as well as anyone.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not an estimate. This is a report of actual expenditures. Has the gentleman ever seen one?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What can we do with it when we read it?

Mr. PAYNE. I thought the gentleman from Maine yielded to me.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did; and that gives you an opportunity to obtain the floor, if you can. I can not secure the floor for you. I can only yield to you.

Mr. PAYNE. I will endeavor to obtain the floor through the recognition of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine yields to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to read from the rules:

The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several Departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the nine standing committees on the public expenditures in the several Departments, as follows:

Then follow these nine distinguished committees. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to say in that same connection, in the Forty-eighth Congress I had the distinguished honor of being one of the minority members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and that committee was sufficiently vitalized to make an examination of some affairs in the Interior Department, and we did make an examination and report and submitted it to the House; and the gentleman who was then known as the "watch dog of the Treasury" (I refer to the late gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Holman, who was so long chairman of the Committee on Appropriations) said that that was one of the most valuable reports that ever came to the House and that it saved a great deal of money. Now, that committee, in one little branch of the Government which was under its jurisdiction, undoubtedly saved the Government considerable money by this investigation. I only cite this rule and this example in order to encourage the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. To go and do likewise.

Mr. PAYNE. To encourage him in welldoing, and I hope he will go into all these questions of which his committee has jurisdiction, and that we will hear something from him in the future that will tend to reduce these increased expenditures.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The committee that the gentleman from Maine is on does not happen to have jurisdiction of all subjects.

Mr. PAYNE. No; only one of them, and I think he will be busy enough with that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. May I offer a suggestion, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I yield for a moment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggest to the gentleman, in order to get all precedents before the House, whether he knows what the action of the House was when the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department in the last Congress undertook to get jurisdiction of an investigation of that Department?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That question has already been put, and I simply state this, if the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me, that personally I have no recollection of the details of the incident. I think that is the same report to which the gentleman from West Virginia referred, suggesting that it was likely to interfere with some prosecutions.

Mr. TAWNEY. The House ruled that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department did not have jurisdiction of the resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. That was a resolution to investigate, and the House did not give to that committee the authority to investigate, but the rules seem to give that authority to the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. The House referred the resolution to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine and of the House to the fact that while the gentleman from New York correctly read a portion of Rule XI, I do not think——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope the gentleman does not intimate that he left out a part of it.

Mr. WANGER. He left out the vital part of it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think the reading correctly gives the meaning of the rule, and, therefore, I wish to read the heading of this rule:

RULE XI.—POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating—

Then follows the part read by the gentleman from New York. That is, it may well be said, that this rule says that all proposed legislation upon the subjects within the jurisdiction of these committees is referred to the committees. Consequently it is a matter of grave doubt, in view of the first paragraph of this rule, whether the committee had the right to do what the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department so commendably and successfully did do. Now, my contention is that all doubt as to the duties of these committees should be done away with by an addition to this rule specifically providing that it shall be the duty of each of these committees upon its own motion to annually investigate all expenditures in the Departments under its charge and report all abuses to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Maine allow me to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question in the time of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the interpretation of the rule by the gentleman from Iowa that any bill relating, for instance, to retrenchment in the Treasury Department would be referable to this Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I so understand it.

Mr. PAYNE. Having jurisdiction of such a bill, why hasn't the committee just as much right to call in any gentleman from the Treasury Department and have an examination in regard to that as has the Committee on Appropriations in regard to any legislation that they have?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would not be prepared to say that it had not the right, but when you go on and say it is the duty of this committee annually to conduct an independent investigation of its Department when there is nothing in the rule except so far as the jurisdiction of proposed legislation, then I am prepared to acquit these gentlemen who all of these years have been neglectful—if that is the proper word—of conducting such investigation.

Mr. PAYNE. I agree that if no bill of that kind is referred to them of course they have no jurisdiction to examine, but still, as members of the committee and as Members of the House, there may be possibly incumbent upon them a duty to introduce a bill and refer it to the committee in order to get jurisdiction. The gentleman will understand me that I am not finding fault with the committees.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman realize that if the rule required an independent investigation and report we would have the benefit, at every Congress, in every Department, of an investigation similar to the one conducted by the gentleman from New York which was so valuable to the Interior Department?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I was only a minority member of the subcommittee then.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to get the judgment of my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], for I know him to be one of the best lawyers in the House. I will take his suggestions under prayerful consideration and examine them with reference to this question.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is the gentleman going to name the offices that have been unnecessarily created, as he thinks?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I am not going into that detail. It is impossible for me to go into the details. If the several committees that report appropriations, numbering seventeen or eighteen members each, with a half a dozen subcommittees, can not get at these details when they have before them the subjects for investigation, it is certainly more difficult for one man to investigate all the various questions and undertake to specify as to the offices. We have to rely on the committees for that purpose. I am going to briefly call attention and I will put in the RECORD an analysis of the appropriation bill for 1906. I call attention to a few of the larger items. In the Treasury Department the offices created in excess of those omitted amounts to $136,460. That is the added charge on the Treasury. In the Department of Commerce and Labor the excess of offices created against those omitted was $79,080.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is speaking of current appropriations?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; in the appropriation bill of last year. I will call attention to this pending bill later, because this particular bill is entirely in line with my suggestions and conservative. I will say that it omits more offices than it creates. The Committee on Appropriations, in my judgment, is entitled to a great deal of credit for the effective work that it has done all along this line. The chairman has been efficient, and he has been seconded by every man on the committee.

While on that point I will call attention to what they have done. They have made a reduction in the charge on the Treasury for this year in the aggregate of something like $76,506.25, so that this particular bill that is pending here now is not subject to this criticism.

Instead of creating more offices than it omits, it omitted more than it created, $76,506.25, as stated by the chairman, and the committee certainly are entitled to the thanks of the House for the work that they have done in that direction.

I desire now to call attention to a few of these items in the bill for 1906—that is, the bill passed in 1905. I have already called attention to the increases in the postal service, giving that amount of $2,439,339. In addition to that the Post-Office Department had an increase of something like $43,450. Then the District of Columbia had offices created amounting to $149,950, and omitted $2,165, showing a net increase of $147,785.

The military establishment showed an increase last year of $39,210, and for this year in the military establishment the increase in salaries—that is, the increase, taking the balance of offices created as against those omitted—is $72,900, as compared with $39,210 for last year. Now, the chairman of the Committee stated, and I have no doubt that it is true, that every one of them is necessary; and I may say right here, in connection with the military bill, there is an increase in salaries in the military bill this year which has already passed the House of something like $60,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] that as the bill passed the House those increases were stricken out.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am going to call attention to that. As the bill passed the House the items were stricken out of the bill, aggregating more than $300,000, upon the ground, as I understand it, that they were appropriations made for offices that had not been created by any affirmative law, but that were simply continued from year to year in the appropriation bills. My analysis here is made upon the basis that those offices will probably be put back in another body, and that the bill will come back here practically as it entered the House, and I understand the increase to be necessary.

I desire now to call attention to one other item. The naval establishment had offices created as against offices omitted of $1,253,893. Without taking any more time of the committee, I will insert in my remarks here this detailed list of offices created and omitted.

I desire now to call attention to the Indian bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain that very briefly. The Indian Territory matters have been causing a great deal of trouble.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have not reached that yet.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that was the reason for the increase of the number of offices.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will explain that when I reach it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. After this year that will be stopped. These tribes will go out of existence, and I hope the Indian Territory will become a part of the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will insert here a detailed statement of offices created and offices omitted for the fiscal year 1906:

| | Created. | Omitted. | Reduction. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Legislative, executive, and judicial | $12,500 | | |
| House of Representatives | 18,000 | $7,400 | |
| Library of Congress | 720 | | |

| Indian Department | 1,200 | 1,800 | |
| Postal service | 2,770,100 | 330,800 | |

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have an analysis, taken from the work of these two clerks of these committees, of the salaries that have been increased and reduced since 1889. I here insert the summary for seventeen years.

Summary of offices the salaries of which have been increased and reduced, and the net increase in each case.

| Year. | Increased. | Reduced. | Net increase. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1889 | $36,486 | $1,387 | $35,099 |
| 1890 | 141,295 | 1,808 | 139,487 |
| 1891 | 111,018 | 1,820 | 109,198 |
| 1892 | 273,849 | 31,120 | 192,729 |
| 1893 | 51,894 | 22,750 | 29,144 |
| 1894 | 33,741 | 27,800 | 5,941 |
| 1895 | 39,506 | 18,328 | 21,178 |
| 1896 | 30,970 | 1,680 | 29,290 |
| 1897 | 6,814 | 400 | 6,414 |
| 1898 | 103,470 | 1,760 | 101,710 |
| 1899 | 135,188 | 1,658 | 133,529 |
| 1900 | 41,974 | 1,410 | 40,564 |
| 1901 | 83,173 | 8,100 | 75,073 |
| 1902 | 118,576 | 13,120 | 105,456 |
| 1903 | 204,952 | 600 | 204,352 |
| 1904 | 79,926 | 400 | 79,526 |
| 1905 | 42,975 | 1,500 | 41,475 |

The average increase per year—and I do not find, by the way, any year when there was more decrease than increase—for seventeen years was $79,371.

Now, in the Indian bill this year there is an increase in one item alone of $98,205, and it is entirely true, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], that that was rendered necessary by the fact that a large number of Indian police that are necessarily employed in the Indian Territory have heretofore been employed, as they say, at a very small rate of wage, which was very inadequate compensation. It was necessary to raise it from $15 to $25. Am I correct in that, I will ask the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; the gentleman is correct.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Still, of course, the raise occurs, so that in one bill we have in this session increased salaries of more than the average of all the bills for seventeen years. Now, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which is now pending before the House, has a net increase of $8,530. The salaries increased in the military bill, which has already passed the House, amounted to $60,000 for the item of contract surgeons for the year 1907, making an aggregate of $166,730 increase of salaries with these three appropriation bills that have already passed, as against an average increase for seventeen years of about $79,000.

Now, I shall not take any further time of the committee in discussing this general question, but I think these facts coming from these records should put us all upon inquiry. If it is the judgment of the House that these conditions should be investigated by these committees on expenditures in the Departments, well and good——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have been in conversation here with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and we would like to know if we understood correctly what the gentleman from Maine stated concerning the increased appropriations for salaries in the District of Columbia. Was it $147,000?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was offices created. The new offices created in the District of Columbia in the appropriation bill for 1906, as against the offices omitted, was $147,785.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does that mean the increase of the salary list in this District?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why was that and what was it for?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can not tell you. I have not had time to examine the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I simply say that the analysis made by these clerks shows that in the District of Columbia for 1906 the offices created amounted to $149,950. That is the charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those are new offices?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; and the offices omitted amounted to $2,165, making a net increase of offices created of $147,785.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, now, has the gentleman from Maine any idea as to what that increased expense relates?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I have not had time to examine these various appropriations in detail.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This increase in the salary list of almost a hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year is only in the District of Columbia?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is an increase in offices, and that is a charge on the Treasury, and that is the result of the analysis of the clerks.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What does it cover—school-teachers, policemen, and all other classes of service?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is new offices; it is not increases in salary; it is new offices, and covers everything in that line.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Extension of the police, education, and everything?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly. Let me state right here, so the gentleman will get the answer before he questions me further: As I have said, I think, a half dozen times, I have not undertaken to examine the details of any of these appropriation bills. It is simply impossible for a man to be sufficiently advised of the circumstances under which the appropriations are made without having all opportunities and spending a vast amount of time to reach an intelligent judgment, and I have not examined the details in relation to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I am simply giving to the House what these clerks give as the basis of this analysis.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, one might very reasonably infer from the character of the gentleman's criticisms and from the character of other speeches which have been made in relation to the administration of this Government that it is reeking with corruption, that it is rotten from center to circumference, and yet I undertake to say that there is not a man in this House or a member of any committee who can put his finger on any single additional office and say it is not necessary. I want to say that there has not been a single additional office created, but that some committee has at the time investigated the question carefully and thoroughly and reached a conclusion that it was essential to the proper administration of the public service. I want to say I do not like to have the impression go out to the country that the administration at Washington is so altogether rotten and indefensible. This impression would seem to result from speeches which have been made on this bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, let me say this to the gentleman——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I want to know what the gentleman's remedy is?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana can not put that kind of an assertion into the mouth of the gentleman from Maine. I have repeatedly during this short address, if the gentleman has been here to hear it, declaimed any such criticism. I deny that the Government is subject to the charge the gentleman undertakes to put in my mouth. It does not lie in the mouth of the gentleman from Indiana, when I simply call attention here for the purpose of asking the committees to carefully scrutinize these appropriations, to state that I am making a charge of corruption against the Government of the United States. If he knows what the English language means, and he has heard me use it, he knows that with propriety he can not stand here and make that insinuation against me. I simply said that in my judgment the conditions are such that it requires an investigation, and when the gentleman undertakes to put into my mouth the assertion that the Departments are reeking with corruption, I repudiate the assertion, and the gentleman knows he has not any right to make that suggestion. There is not a word I have said, there is not a figure I have produced that is honorably and fairly entitled to that construction from any man on this floor, Republican or Democrat, and I do not propose to submit to that kind of an insinuation from any man on this floor. You can not put words into my mouth in that way, I tell you that. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, if the gentleman will permit. I have listened here to this debate, and I saw the attempt on the part of one committee after another to prove an alibi, and I thought each one succeeded, each one disclaimed the blame of the existing condition of things revealed in the figures disclosed by the gentleman from Maine, and each one put the responsibility on somebody else. Now, I think my remarks taken down by the Reporter will bear me out in the statement that I made no such charge, but I said these criticisms without pointing to any specific instances of maladministration will go throughout the country and carry with them the impression that the civil administration of the Government is altogether rotten and that it ought to be reorganized from top to bottom. I said that impression would go out over the country from the character of criticisms in this House without pointing out something at least that would justify criticisms like the gentleman has made. What is the object of his animadversions upon the Administration if it is not to show that something is wrong? What is his purpose if it is not to demonstrate to the House and the country the bad condition of the Administration? Will the gentleman answer that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. I have answered it half a dozen times in the speech I have made. Now, if the gentleman from Indiana, under the excitement that seems to perturb him, has in mind any gentleman who has made that kind of criticism and spoken about corruption in these Departments, let him address his kind and courteous remarks to those gentlemen and reserve that kind of criticism for the people to whom it belongs. I have stated it over and over again in the course of this speech that I called attention to this condition solely for the purpose of calling the attention of the committees to these conditions and urging increased care and caution upon them in reporting bills creating offices and increasing salaries. Now, I challenge the gentleman—and I will not change the RECORD, if the Reporters have been able to get my remarks—I challenge him to find a word that I have uttered here that is in any sense a criticism of improper or corrupt conduct on the part of any man connected with the Government of the United States. Has it reached the pass that a man can not call attention to facts for the purpose of arresting the attention of Congress in order that we may act intelligently, judiciously, and properly in respect to appropriations without being subject to such violent insinuation, without cause, and which almost reaches the dignity of abuse, from a man ordinarily so kind as my distinguished friend from Indiana?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. As I understood the gentleman, he stated that last year in the District of Columbia there were created offices making a tax upon the Government to the extent of $150,000—nearly that, as I understood the figures. If so, will the gentleman now answer the question and please tell us what these increases of offices in the District were, where they are, or has the gentleman any record that would show that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have no detailed analysis of the record.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will understand the drift of my question. It is whether these are increases in the District that have grown up in several years? It may be that there were increases that have extended over several years.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have never gone over it in that detail. I can only say that they aggregated, in all the Departments, in 1905—that is this year that we were talking about—$10,456,695, and in 1904, $14,306,147, and for 1903, $14,333,297. Now, I have not gone into the details, because it would take too much time to go into them, and it would be impossible without the expenditure of a vast amount of time, which I did not have at my command, to get an intelligent understanding of the details.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Do I understand the gentleman directly to say that the increase in the official salaries in the Navy Department in the year 1905 was $1,200,000?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The figures that I get from the analysis are these: Offices created, amounting to $1,263,012. I understand that covers the whole Department.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That includes the men in the service?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have no doubt it does. This includes the full charge that is made upon the Treasury by the Department. Everything in the line of an increase from the men in the service up.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry? You spoke of a number of increases of salaries on positions in the District of Columbia, and the inference from your remarks has been that the Committees on Appropriations in previous Congresses, are largely responsible for this increase. Have you taken into consideration the fact that during every Congress we are enacting laws, reported from the legislative committees of the House, creating these offices for which the Committee on Appropriations must necessarily appropriate the salaries?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Unquestionably.

Mr. TAWNEY. So that it is not all due to increases reported in the appropriations, but that they are largely due to legislation enacted by Congress; and therefore Congress is responsible for the increases, and not the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am not undertaking to say that they were. I am glad to have the gentleman make that suggestion in order that it may go into the RECORD. Undoubtedly a large number of these increases have been and are made in this way. They were the result of legislation that has passed the House, and the committee were obliged to provide for it. Over and over again I have said I have no criticism to make upon the committees of the last session or the committee of this session. I have repeated that, I think, eight or ten times.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman know of any offices that have been created by the legislative committee of the House for the District of Columbia that were not necessary?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not saying or assuming that there were any offices created that were not necessary, but I simply call your attention to this distinction, for the reason that the House might, from the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, get the impression that all of these increases were reported in the appropriation bills, and that the several committees having jurisdiction over appropriations were solely responsible for the increases. It is for that reason and that reason alone that I have called attention to this distinction between increase created by appropriation bills and those created by laws passed by Congress.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Precisely so; and now I will say this, that I make no question so far as the various committees having charge of appropriations are concerned. I have said this, and I am going to conclude what I have to say with this suggestion, and a final suggestion, and that is that while it may be true that these committees have not time to make these investigations, I have said that, in my judgment, there are a great many men in the official service that are unnecessary there. That would be undoubtedly inherent, from the very nature of the case, in so large a service. No man could reasonably expect that the Government of the United States could carry on its affairs and have its service absolutely narrowed down to the men who are absolutely necessary. But my proposition has been that the conditions of increase have been so much and so large that it behooves us to see that we carefully scrutinize these questions.

Finally, allow me to say that the President of the United States, leading in this, as he has led in a great many other very important questions, started, as he well might, as a man considerate of the public service, desiring to see it well and economically administered, himself began, as he had a right to begin, this inquiry, and he is entitled to the credit therefor. I do not know but that some supersensitive gentleman like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] may intimate that President Roosevelt, when he appointed the Keep Commission, assumed that there was gross corruption in the Departments, and therefore appointed the Commission. Well, I think if anyone does make that suggestion, the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the White House can well take his chances before the country on the proposition that, as the Chief Executive of a great country, the head of all these Executive Bureaus, he, on his own motion and his own suggestion, began to look around and see, so large has this establishment grown, whether or not it could not be reorganized on a sounder business basis, and some of its expenses eliminated, and some of its officials made unnecessary.

He is entitled to commendation therefor not only by the House and the Senate, but by the country, and I stand behind him absolutely on that proposition. And I call attention to these conditions in order to show that the President himself had ample occasion for his action and that we should now, if we can, place all the Executive Departments on a sound, legitimate, business basis; and so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to cooperate with him and with any Member of this House, and so far as I can I will discharge to the extent of my ability whatever duties may be devolved upon me in connection with the question of ascertaining just exactly what, if anything, need be done in order to get the best business results at the lowest possible expenditure; and I say that no Member of this House on either side can justly charge me in connection with this analysis or statement with any other purpose or any other desire. And with these suggestions, Mr. Chairman, I leave these estimates with the committee.

Mr. WANGER. Would not the gentleman from Maine like to have the explanation of the incident referred to by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] supplemented by the further information that the special investigation made by that Committee on Expenditures was made, not simply under the rule, but was made pursuant to a resolution adopted by the House directing the investigation to be made? I think the gentleman from New York will concede that.

Mr. PAYNE. That is certainly so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If that be true, it differentiates it in that respect from all the other committees that have similar duties, because the committee was simply doing what the House specially instructed it to do, and I am very glad to get the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WANGER. And when the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department reported that condition of affairs which led to the presentation of articles of impeachment against then Secretary of War Belknap, again it was pursuant to a resolution adopted by the House directing it to make that investigation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am very greatly obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because I was certainly uninformed in relation to these very important matters.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine if there is a necessity for any parliamentary method to be adopted by this House of ascertaining with perfect accuracy the rightfulness of all expenditure in the Departments? Have we not standing committees of this House who are charged, each one of them, with looking into the matters of expenditures in the Department for which they are appointed? There are nine of these standing committees, and probably not one of them has had a session during this Congress. It is the duty of these committees to investigate these matters, and if there are wrongs, if there are mistakes, are not the distinguished gentlemen who are at the head of these committees responsible for it? They have the power to make these investigations. It is their duty to make them, and there is no possible excuse for their existence except that they discharge those duties.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say that the distinguished gentleman from Iowa is on hand, but he is a little behindhand. [Laughter.] We have been receiving, if the committee will indulge me a moment, a great deal of information on precisely these lines, and there are a great many Members here who seem to be inspired with the same curiosity that has inspired the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.] Whether or not it will produce fruitful results I do not quite know. I have endeavored to assert with more or less earnestness and perspicuity that so far as I was concerned I was ready to do whatever was my appropriate duty in that regard. I thank the committee for its attention. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 10101. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey to the State of Minnesota a certain tract of land situated in the county of Dakota, State of Minnesota.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I have very little concern with the parliamentary question as to what committee should investigate and report upon the matters which the gentleman from Maine has been discussing. I have a very strong conviction, however, that the Committee on Appropriations has shown that great inequalities exist in the Departments; that unwarranted extravagances are found there, and that it is the duty of this House to remain in session until these inequalities are corrected and these abuses and extravagances wiped out.

The leaders of this House can always devise ways and means to carry into effect their purposes. If you want to correct these abuses you can do it. You can find the appropriate committee; you can find the appropriate ways and the proper remedies.

Two or three days ago I inquired of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] if the Committee on Appropriations had done anything to equalize the salaries in the various Departments and bureaus—if they had made any provision in this appropriation bill to correct the abuses which they have discovered—and the gentleman from Georgia replied that it would take three months to straighten out all those matters, and asked me the question if I was willing to stay here three months to do it. I want to say, as I said then, "Yes, I am willing that the American Congress should sit until next December rather than it should adjourn and leave undisposed of the business that devolves upon it."

You have decided long ago that the tariff can only be revised by its friends. You have decided that you will not revise it at this session of the Congress. Then if you go away from here without correcting the abuses that the Appropriations Committee has developed, you deliberately say that you will not correct them for at least two years.

Now, I want to ask you what business man, what man on this floor, if acting in a matter concerning his private affairs, discovered abuses and extravagances, and the wrongs that the Appropriations Committee has brought to our attention, would not proceed instantly to correct them? If you had a private business which was suffering from bad management and from extravagance, you would proceed instantly to correct the evils. You are sitting here as trustees of the American people; you hold the purse strings of the Treasury; you are bound by every principle of law, you are bound by every principle that governs honorable men, to exercise yourselves in the public behalf more readily than you would in your own. It would be an insult to the intelligence of any man who is responsible for the management in his house to say that that man would quietly let the abuses in his private business go uncorrected for two years. Yet if you adjourn this Congress without correcting these abuses, that is what it means—that you are willing to let the public business go without your attention. A court of chancery can not reach you. If it could it would hold you to a stricter responsibility for your conduct in the management of trust affairs than it would in the management of your individual affairs. Why, I read in the paper this morning that the Speaker of this House, in a Republican conference, stated that you had three months that you could spend here in order to force the unholy alliance between Arizona and New Mexico.

Yet gentlemen of the House of Representatives, are you not willing to stay here three months in order to protect the public Treasury? Are you not willing to be faithful to the trust that has been imposed upon you? What does this showing reveal? Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, in the multiplicity of our duties few Members read the hearings. But these hearings show that in every bureau there are clerks sitting side by side performing similar service, some getting a salary of $900 a year and others a salary of $1,800 or $2,000 a year. They show that in every Department and every bureau these inequalities exist. Yet we are told that they must go on because, forsooth, we lack time; that it would take time to correct this abuse. These reports show another thing, and if they do not show it the fact can be easily ascertained, that they have bureaus and chiefs and assistant chiefs and chief clerks and janitors in every Department of the Government until they are positively in one another's way. There is not a first-class business man in all the country who would not reduce the force in every bureau almost from 25 to 50 per cent, and yet year after year the heads of these Departments go before the Committee on Appropriations with the same old song; they want an increase in the force and an increase in pay. I was reading in the hearings the other day the remarkable statement from some of the heads of these Departments that unless the salaries were increased they could not keep their help. I wondered if by some chance the Civil Service Commission, that great body which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] admires so much, had snatched from the American stage the grimmest humorists that the world ever knew. These heads of bureaus one by one testified before the Committee on Appropriations that unless the salaries were raised they could not keep their force. You gentlemen over there who have something to do with patronage will enjoy the joke, but a little further investigation revealed the fact that it was not humor but that it was solemn truth. How does it become so? It is because one bureau is bidding against another. In every bureau of every Department of this Government the United States is the only employer of labor, and yet these bureaus are competing with one another. One bureau goes to clerks in some other Department and offers to increase their wages if they will come over to that bureau. Now, I do not know what you are going to do, I do not know how you are going to do it, but, as I have said, the leaders of this House know how to do what they want to do. You ought to stop these bureaus and Departments from competing one against the other. You ought to stop one bureau chief from taking the help out of some other bureau.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, if he has read this bill he has observed that the committee has reported a provision for the accomplishment of that identical purpose by prohibiting the transfer from one Department to another Department until the clerk desiring the transfer has served at least three years in the Department from which he desires to be transferred.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota. My remarks are based on the hearings. I intended before I took my seat to express my appreciation of his industry and zeal in this matter. The only complaint that I have to make—and that is not against the Committee on Appropriations—is that the committee has not gone far enough toward the correction of this abuse; but they have submitted the matter to this House, and I believe that if the House will show a disposition to accept the reforms that they have recommended, we can then go forward with other reforms. Now, I want to say further, in response to what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has said, that we ought not only to prohibit clerks from being transferred from one Department to another, so as to break up this abuse, but we ought to equalize the compensation of the clerks so that they will have no incentive to go from one Department to another.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Reorganize and reclassify.

Mr. JOHNSON. Reorganize and reclassify the whole service—wipe out these disbursing officers. Every place they can get three or four or a half dozen clerks together to attend to some correspondence or something else, they come to Congress and want us to make a bureau out of it. Then, when it is made a bureau, they want a chief and an assistant chief and a chief clerk and a disbursing officer, and so it goes all along the line. I want some committee of this House to reorganize and reclassify all the Departments and all the employees. We should wipe out these various disbursing officers and let money be paid from the Department in which the clerks are employed. Certainly one disbursing officer in charge of a Department would be ample.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman certainly knows that that is the system at the present time. The disbursements made by each Department are made by a disbursing officer appointed by the head of the Department, or who has been promoted by him to that office.

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman think that that is good practice?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not. I think the practice is subject to criticism. I think we ought to have a central disbursing bureau under the jurisdiction and responsible to the head of the Treasury Department, and that disbursing office ought not to be responsible to the head of the administrative Department which expends the money.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a good suggestion. It seems to me that one officer ought to be able to pay everybody.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say this: There is this criticism that you would meet, and I question whether any committee could put through a provision of that kind, and for the reason that all of the Department clerks here insist that they should be paid their monthly or semimonthly compensation in currency and not in checks. With a central disbursing office it would be necessary to disburse in the form of checks, which, in my judgment, the Government ought to do. But the sentiment of this city would be so overwhelmingly against it it would be a question of whether or not the Members would have the courage to stand up against it.

Mr. JOHNSON. In response to the gentleman from Minnesota, I admit it may be more convenient for the clerks, but what I want to do is that thing which is best for the American people and the public Treasury, and I do not think anybody will resign because he has to receive a check instead of currency. If so, I am satisfied we could fill his place from the State of Maryland. [Applause.] There are a thousand applications for every vacancy. Now, Mr. Chairman, in these remarks I have not imputed anything to the Departments except negligence and extravagance. I read in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee where a gentleman who draws a salary of $4,500 from the United States Treasury, and how much outside I do not know, testified that he paid $900 a year for the hire of a horse for the use of the Library. Well, gentlemen, that is at least a want of common business sense. Nine hundred dollars for the hire of a horse! Now, when such things as that are taking place, do you not think it is time for somebody to go down and find out how this money is being spent and why it is being spent? That is what I want this House to do. I said a while ago that every chief and every head of a Department, almost without exception, who comes before a committee asks for two things, an increase in his force and an increase in pay. I believe it would paralyze the Committee on Appropriations if a man coming down before them told them he had more force than he needed. You gentlemen will remember that in 1898 the United States engaged in a little spat with Spain. We increased the Army very suddenly from about 25,000 to 100,000 men. It was necessary to place a large temporary force in the War Department, several hundred clerks, not under the operation of the civil service. We did not have time to get them that way. The war with Spain is over, the Army has been reduced to 60,000 men, and yet the temporary force which was put in the War Department in 1898 remains there to this day, and more than that, in addition to that they have had an increase in force——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that that temporary force has been covered into the regular force a while ago?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. PALMER. What odds does it make whether they are covered in or not?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say in addition to that there have been no appointments made in the War Department for quite a while.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should think not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Where resignations and deaths occurred they were filled a long while ago from that temporary roll. I want to say another thing in connection with it, that the Secretary of War is on record as saying that that temporary force was one of the best forces he ever had there.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, that is an argument against civil service; I am not talking about civil service now. Now, Mr. Chairman, when I got up here I did not know what I was going to say, but I want to say I want this Congress to do its duty, and you know if you do not do it at this time you can not do it at the short session, and I presume at the long session of the Sixtieth Congress you will want to revise the tariff, and you will not have time to do it then.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that another party will probably revise the tariff in the long session of the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend from Kentucky suggests, and it is a very happy suggestion, as he makes that kind always, that another party in the Sixtieth Congress will revise the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I hope that this Fifty-ninth Congress will relieve us of the great burden of having to revise both the tariff and the Departments. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another thing to which I want to call attention—I do not know to what extent it is carried on, but it is immaterial whether it is great or small, it is wrong. The testimony before the Committee on Appropriations shows that some people are farming out offices. Now, if there is one principle that is obnoxious to all good people it is for a man to farm out a public office; yet the testimony shows that some of these Capitol employees, who get $60 a month to discharge certain duties, go down and pay some darky a dollar and a half a week to discharge those duties for them. You can all find out if you will read this testimony.

One other thing, Mr. Chairman, and that is the age limit. The papers have criticised it very severely. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if a man knew when he went into the public service that at the end of a certain time, whether it be two years or seven years or twenty years, he would be compelled to step out and mingle again with the private citizenship of this country, it would be a good thing for him. Not in any spirit of unfriendliness to the people in the Departments, but because my observation told me that many of them became mere machines and absolutely lost their individuality and their personality, I have invariably advised young men in my district to stay out of these Departments.

I think it is a good thing for them to know that some day they will go out. It will teach them self-reliance; teach them economy. They will make some provision for old age and a rainy day. The only trouble is that when this civil-service law was first enacted it did not provide a fixed period of eight or ten years, after which an employee would go out; and then, if they could work their way back, let them do it.

Sometimes people tell me, talking about Members of Congress, that two years is too short a time; it looks like it ought to be four. My reply to them is that the men who founded this Government were wise in their day and generation. They provided that the representatives of the people should constantly go back to the people and give an account of their stewardship. If the people have succeeded in electing a public servant of high mind and high character, who is faithful, they can return him as often as they will. If, on the other hand, they are being misrepresented, it is fortunately so that they will not be misrepresented long. So that every two years we go back to our people to give an account of our stewardship; to let the people pass on our fitness for office. Why, in this great democracy of ours, where equality of opportunity is held out to every man, why should one class of people hold office for life? One of the Presidents of the United States, after he had served in that great office, went back to the State of Virginia and accepted the humble position of a country magistrate, and in doing so he ennobled the Presidency of the United States and he ennobled

American citizenship. But we have got a class around here who absolutely believe that they ought to be held in office for twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty years—as long as they live—whether they render any service or not.

Now, this committee has acted in a humanitarian way. It has provided a time in the future. They are not cutting off these old people now, but at a time in the future the ax will fall. That gives them seven years in which to make preparation for coming years. Joseph, down in the land of Egypt, having foresight of the intention and purposes of the Almighty, laid up during seven years of plenty enough to feed all the world in seven years of want. Let them prepare in the years of plenty for the years to follow. Let those who are now in the Departments or who may hereafter go there understand that in this great democracy of equal citizenship they must some day go back to the body of the people whence they came.

So, Mr. Chairman, I have taken just thirty-five minutes more than I intended. I am obliged to the committee for its attention. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if there is nobody that wishes to occupy any time now, I will move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Warren V. Howard (H. R. 15926, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session), no adverse report having been made thereon.

GALON S. CLEVENGER.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report, and to have it printed in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
GEO. R. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. J. MCCUMBER,
N. B. SCOTT,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,

Statement to accompany report of committee of conference on disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger.

This bill originally passed the House with the provision that the claimant should be pensioned subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as provided by section 4720 of the Revised Statutes, United States, according to the degree of his disability, but was amended in the Senate so as to allow a rating of $20 per month.

The result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment at $20 per month, and your conferees recommend that the bill pass as it originally passed the House.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
GEO. R. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

FINAL DISPOSITION OF THE AFFAIRS OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the conference report on the bill H. R. 5976, to have it printed in the RECORD under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5976) providing for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be printed under the rule.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, by agreement with the gentleman from Georgia, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be concluded on Monday at half past 2 o'clock.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. With the understanding that the time between 12 and half past 2 is not to be consumed by some other foreign matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that Monday is suspension day. However, the House may dispense with that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will change the form of my request, Mr. Speaker, and ask unanimous consent that when the House goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill that general debate be concluded in two hours thereafter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the regular order, which is the call of committees.

The Committee on Military Affairs was called.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the consideration of the pending measure, and move the previous question upon the bill and amendments to and including the passage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman agreed that I should have the right to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Clerk will report the title of the bill. The Chair is under the impression that it is the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15744) to abolish the office of Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I raise the question of consideration against that bill.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that the question of consideration was pending, and a division was being taken. As many as are in favor of considering the bill will say "aye;" those opposed, "no."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSVENOR) there were—ayes 70.

Pending the taking of the negative vote—

Mr. PRINCE said: Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding, I do not care to call the previous question upon the bill and amendments. If anybody desires to offer an amendment to the bill, I am perfectly willing that the amendment or amendments may be submitted to the House for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. But this is the question of consideration.

Mr. PRINCE. I think there was a misunderstanding, and I want to be fair with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, let us take the vote.

The negative vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 70 and the noes are 28.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Evidently not a quorum present. The doors will be closed——

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, a call of the House is in order.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York moves that the House do now adjourn. That vote will have to be taken first.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LITTAUER and Mr. COCKRAN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 88.

Accordingly the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, there is so much noise and confusion in the House that I fear Members do not understand the situation.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the Chair will again say that the order is under the rule in the absence of a quorum, the question being as to whether the bill called up as unfinished business shall be considered. Upon that motion the want of a quorum was developed, and under the rule the Chair has ordered the doors to be closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absentees, and the Clerk to call the roll. Those favoring consideration will vote "aye," and those opposing consideration will vote "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 32, answered "present" 21, not voting 191, as follows:

During the calling of the roll the following occurred:

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the question of consideration be agreed to and that the demand for the call of the House be withdrawn. The question will then be upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. PRINCE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLMSTED). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. If the question of consideration is withdrawn, does it leave the question of a quorum in the House pending?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is a quorum.

Mr. PRINCE. The question I desire to ask is this: Assuming that the request of the gentleman from Ohio is granted by the House, that it still leaves this measure unfinished for disposition in the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the Chair thinks that the Speaker, having declared that there was no quorum, and the rule now being in operation to secure a quorum, no other business is in order until a quorum is developed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not there a quorum present now by the roll call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not so far.

Mr. PRINCE. Then I call for the regular order.

The Clerk proceeded and completed the calling of the roll.

The following pairs were announced:

For the session:

Mr. CURRIER with Mr. FINLEY.

Until Tuesday:
Mr. TOWNSEND with Mr. LEGARE.
For ten days:
Mr. BISHOP with Mr. BURGESS.

Pending the announcement of the vote, the following occurred:

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire, if it is proper, how many are now present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that 192 are now present.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that constitutes a quorum of the House, and if the Chair will indulge me for a moment, I desire to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how can the gentleman raise that point until the vote is announced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that there are 192 who have answered to their names, voting aye, no, or present.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the statute fixing the number of Members provides for the election of 386, and I understand that 386 were chosen. Two of those Members, one from Pennsylvania, Mr. Castor, and one from Virginia, Mr. Swanson, are not now Members of Congress. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is dead, and the gentleman from Virginia, who was sworn in, has resigned. They are clearly no longer Members of this House. Two persons who were chosen to be Members have never been sworn. They have never qualified. They have not become Members of this House. That, therefore, leaves the membership of this House at 382, of which number 192 constitute a quorum. The Constitution provides that a majority of each house shall constitute a quorum. That, of course, raises the question, what is the "House?" That question has been discussed frequently here in earlier days and in the other Chamber. The question arose during the civil war, when a certain section of the country did not elect and send Representatives to the United States Congress. The statute provided for a much larger number, but only 183 Members had been chosen, of whom 92 were present. Mr. Speaker Grow announced that 92 constituted a quorum. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, made the point of order that it did not, but after debate and after ruling by Mr. Speaker Grow, Mr. Vallandigham concurred. Mr. Speaker Grow did not go so far as to decide whether a Member who had been chosen, but had not been sworn, would be considered a Member of the House. In the ascertainment of a quorum it was necessary that he should decide for the purposes of the case before him, but I understand that after debate it was held in a similar case in the Senate that a person elected but not sworn is not to be considered. The present rule of the Senate, originally adopted upon the recommendation of a committee of very able Senators, including Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, distinctly specifies that "a majority of Senators duly chosen and sworn" shall make a quorum. Three hundred and eighty-four Members have been "chosen and sworn," but one having died and one having resigned, there are living but 382, and a majority, or 192, constitutes a quorum. Much more might be said, but it seems unnecessary to consume time at this late hour. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the House now consists of 382 Members and that 192 is a constitutional quorum.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, this question came up in a former House when Mr. Reed was the Speaker, following a ruling that had been made by the speaker of the house of representatives in Ohio, which was upheld by the supreme court of the State, being the rule just stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], which now stands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. BYRD, having entered the Chamber, makes 193 present.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, Mr. Speaker, that settles the question. I was going to say that I believe the gentleman is right, but that I hope the Chair would not have to make a ruling.

The SPEAKER. If the House will indulge him for a moment, the Chair will say that he would be glad to hear the gentleman if the question was presented, and that he is inclined to believe that he would be prepared to rule upon the question when it arises. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] is recognized.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, if I should yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] for the sole and express purpose, without debate, to offer an amendment to the bill, would I lose control of the floor?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not put such a question as that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the bill has not yet been reported to the House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the office of Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States shall be, and the same is hereby abolished.

With the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:
"That when the office of Lieutenant-General shall become vacant it shall not hereafter be filled, but said office shall cease and determine."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor for one hour. In that time he can make any motion that he sees proper to make during his hour. If he yields the floor for an amendment——

Mr. PRINCE. I will yield one minute——

The SPEAKER. One moment; in answer to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois the Chair has been referred to the following precedent: A Member who yields the floor to another to offer an amendment loses his right to reoccupy. Now, the gentleman, it occurs to the Chair, may yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio on the condition that it is for an amendment only without the right to occupy his hour. The gentleman from Ohio would have to agree to accept the floor on that condition, or the gentleman can yield the floor absolutely, and then the Chair would have to recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, as I have the floor I do not want to take any chances. [Laughter.] I move the previous question on the bill and amendment up to and including its final passage and ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I wish to ask whether under the rules it would be in order to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois might yield for the purpose indicated to the gentleman from Ohio without waiving his right to the floor?

The SPEAKER. Why, surely.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I then ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have leave to yield to the gentleman from Ohio for the purpose of offering an amendment, without surrendering the right of the gentleman from Illinois to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And to that request I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. PRINCE. I move the previous question upon the bill and the amendment up to and including its final passage, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may submit to the House for its consideration his amendment, or I will offer the amendment myself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will hear my statement there is no need of that. If the gentleman will yield to me one minute of time.

Mr. PRINCE. You can have it on the understanding I do not lose the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In that time I can say all that I desire to say about it, and then you can retake the floor and do what you please.

Mr. PRINCE. With that understanding I will yield one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois yields one minute of time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee:

In line 5 of the printed bill, after the word "when," insert the words "after October 12, 1906."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "when" insert "after October 12, 1906."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, the whole effect of this amendment, if it is agreed to, is to put an end to the Lieutenant-General's office after the 12th day of October. The effect of that bill will be to permit General Corbin to take the place to which he is already designated on the 12th day of April and retire, as he will do, in the early days of August, and then permit General MacArthur to take the place of Lieutenant-General, and then the office ceases. That is all I have to say.

The SPEAKER. Upon this bill and amendments the gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question to the final passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Now, there are twenty minutes on a side for debate, and if gentlemen care to occupy the time the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want any debate. I am willing to have a vote now. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand there are twenty minutes on a side for discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi; although, if he claims it, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman does not seem to claim the time.

Mr. PRINCE. I reserve my time, and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, if he desires that much.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will not be accepted by the House. The gentleman from Ohio has just disclosed the fact that the only motive behind his amendment is to make an exception of two men. If it is right in principle to abolish the Lieutenant-Generalcy, it ought to prevail; if it is a wrong idea, it ought to go down by the votes of this House. The declaration that we are opposed to the further continuance of the office of Lieutenant-General, with a condition that a couple of pets of the gentleman from Ohio or anybody else, or even parliamentary pets, shall have an opportunity to occupy the office for a little while and retire with the rank on half pay, seems to be a self-stultification. I hope if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is accepted, that this amendment as amended may be voted down by the House; because if it be right to abolish this Lieutenant-Generalcy—and I think it is—as a general proposition in the name of general righteousness and the discipline of the Army, then it is wrong to continue it for a certain limited time in order that certain parliamentary pets may enjoy the office and its emoluments. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just a few words in reply. I want to say that General Corbin has been ordered home from the Philippines. He has come home and has been ordered to take command of the department at St. Louis, with a notification to him from the War Department that at once upon the retirement of General Bates he will be promoted to the office of Lieutenant-General in confromity with the command that he has already assumed. Now, then, MacArthur follows. The last two major-generals of the volunteer service who will occupy this position, and they will both of them be promoted in a very few months. Now, a vote of this House to cut off this promotion to these gentlemen, to these grand soldiers in the Army, will amount to a vote of condemnation and rebuke. If these men had not been designated, if the War Department had not given official notification to the world, there could not have been very much said upon this point, and then the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi would be correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What right had the War Department to forestall legislative action by giving that sort of notice?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can only say that it is a long-established custom. General Corbin was in command in Manila, and the War Department certainly has a right to use the ordinary means that an individual would who was about to move from one place to another. Now, there is nothing else in this amendment. Just that. I certainly have presented it fairly to the House, and I hope that the House will not take the rugged course of cutting off these officers, these two fine officers, now, under these circumstances, but will put in the law just what I am entirely willing shall go into it, to repeal the Lieutenant-Generalship. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 100.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PRINCE. We may as well get at it. I call for a call of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will withdraw that, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRINCE. Let the Speaker first see the number in the House. I will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would renew it anyway.

The SPEAKER. This gives the yeas and nays and the call of the House at the same time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is the well-established rule in this House that when the roll has just been called and the Speaker has just announced that a quorum is present, that it is then to be assumed that a quorum is still present.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reply to that statement of the gentleman from Alabama, that there was only one in excess of a quorum, if that was the number, and that one might drop out in fifteen minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was that many.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw the point of no quorum and demand the yeas and nays upon the vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken: and there were—yeas 77, nays 88, answered "present" 16, not voting 202, as follows:

YEAS—77.

For balance of this day:

Mr. WACHTER with Mr. BUTLER of Tennessee.

Mr. MANN with Mr. MCDERMOTT.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania with Mr. WOOD of Missouri.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. I want to withdraw my vote and to answer "present."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I am advised that I am paired for the rest of the day. If so, I desire to withdraw my vote and to vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LONGWORTH). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. The previous question having been ordered on this bill to its passage, will it come up on the next legislative day as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it would.

Mr. PAYNE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, upon that vote I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. It will come up Monday anyway.

Mr. PRINCE. We might just as well finish it now as at any other time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 68, nays 92, answered "present" 9, not voting 214, as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pairs were announced:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. BROOKS with Mr. BRANTLEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon this question the yeas are 68, the nays are 92, answering present 9, and the House declines to adjourn. The House having refused to adjourn, the question recurs on the amendment to the amendment. A quorum having failed to vote on that question, the Chair, in accordance with the rules, directs the doors to be closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the amendment to the amendment, will, when their names are called, answer "aye," and those opposed will answer "no;" those not voting will answer "present."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 82, answered "present" 14, not voting 210, as follows:

No quorum.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For the session:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER with Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

For this question:

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana with Mr. COCKRAN.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts with Mr. LESTER.

During the call of the roll the following occurred:

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know just on what the roll is now being called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the amendment to the amendment, a quorum not having voted.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. PRINCE. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the last roll call was upon the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But we have had a roll call prior to that, and that roll call disclosed the fact that a quorum was not present.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that for the information of the House the Speaker announce the purpose of this roll call.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. When the names are called, do I understand that those voting "yea" are voting in favor of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. PRINCE. And those voting "no" are against the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Sergeant-at-arms been ordered to bring in the absentees?

The SPEAKER. The order was made when the doors were closed.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia that he be permitted to make a brief statement. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the amendment to the amendment. I desire to say, and I think others feel the same way, that we have not feeling enough on this matter to justify keeping us here any longer, and I am constrained to warn gentlemen that they would better let the House adjourn.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A parliamentary inquiry can only be by unanimous consent; nothing can interrupt a roll call except by unanimous consent. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the House should adjourn now what would be the parliamentary status of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is out of the morning hour when the previous question is ordered. It would be the first order of business after the reading of the Journal on Monday.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Did not the Speaker state that next Monday would be suspension day and presumptively nothing else could be done?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman the Chair supposes that a motion might be made to suspend the rules and come in ahead of this, but it would require recognition for that purpose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I simply repeat what the Speaker repeated to the House more than an hour ago warning us that Monday was suspension day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to say one word——

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia. I would feel very much about this as the gentleman from West Virginia expressed himself, but I know that the same—or rather I think, at any rate, that the same—influence will inaugurate another filibuster later on, and we might as well have it out now.

Mr. DALZELL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn, and that requires under the rule a second. All gentlemen will be seated. As many as are in favor of seconding the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until counted.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Upon this motion for a second the ayes are 74, and the noes are 74, and the Chair votes aye to authorize a second.

So the motion to adjourn was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt. As many as are in favor of the motion will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Upon this vote the ayes are 76 and the noes are 75, and the House stands adjourned——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Tellers, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair was a little quick, but I was a little quicker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to declare the House adjourned, and practically the sentence was finished when his ear caught, it seemed, a demand for tellers and it seems to the Chair that it is in time. [Laughter and applause.] As many as are in favor of taking a vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 87.

So the House refused to adjourn. [Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. Is there any way by which unanimous consent can be obtained that this House can now adjourn and let this be the pending measure, without any disposition to delay it, and to take a straight vote on Monday morning?

The SPEAKER. If the House adjourns, the first matter that would come up Monday morning would be upon this motion, because the previous question has been ordered on the bill to its passage.

Mr. PRINCE. Then I move that the House do now adjourn. I do not want to punish anybody. This is not a life-and-death matter. I have not brought this trouble on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House do now adjourn. That requires a second. As many as favor seconding the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until counted.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 94, noes 13.

So the motion to adjourn was seconded.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, and in accordance with the order heretofore adopted, the House (at 6 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, March 19, 1906, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred, as follows:

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, immediately after the routine morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I will speak in regard to the amendment which I have offered to House bill 12987.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing that the act approved April 15, 1904, entitled "An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes," shall not take effect until July 1, 1909, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to fix the compensation of the clerk to the Committee on Manufactures at $2,220 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $29,200 for the Wahpeton Indian School, North Dakota, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for the extension of experimental forest planting on forest reserves, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KITTREDGE submitted an amendment authorizing the issuance of a patent in fee simple to Julia Picotte, Yankton Sioux allottee, for land heretofore allotted to her, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate

$10,000 for the relief of the widows and minor children of Capt. Charles W. Dakin and Thomas J. Hennessy, members of the San Francisco fire department, who lost their lives fighting a fire on board the U. S. Army transport Meade, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for completing the equipment of military posts with the necessary lighters, launches, and yawls for submarine-mine work, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 to purchase for the Indians in California now residing on reservations which do not contain land suitable for cultivation, and for Indians who are not now upon reservations in that State, suitable tracts or parcels of land and water rights in that State, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LONG submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee, severally, to Massie Chandler and Nannie Chandler, Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian allottees, for lands heretofore allotted to them in the Territory of Oklahoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee, severally, to No-wa-hi, Darwin Hayes, Red Plume and Shoe, Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, for not to exceed 40 acres of land heretofore allotted to them in the Territory of Oklahoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent in fee simple to Bud Chandler, a member of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache tribes of Indians for lands heretofore allotted to him, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. The hearings held before the Committee on the Philippines on the bill to amend the act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, have so far been printed only for the use of the committee. I move that the hearings be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. DOLLIVER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

LIEU FOREST RESERVE LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate, on the first Monday in December, 1906, the names of the persons, firms, and corporations who conveyed or relinquished to the Government of the United States lands within the limits of Government forest reserves, and who duly recorded the same in the proper county, prior to the act of March 3, 1905, and who had prior to said act failed to select other public lands in lieu of the lands so conveyed or relinquished, or who have failed, through no fault of their own, to obtain patents to lands selected by them in lieu of lands so conveyed or relinquished, as provided by the act of June 4, 1897, and who can not on account of said act of March 3, 1905, make such selection; and also report the number of acres so conveyed or relinquished.

That in order to procure such information, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to require all such persons, firms, and corporations to file in the Land Department, within a time to be by him designated, such proofs of their conveyance or relinquishment as he may prescribe; and he is further authorized and directed to make such further orders, rules, and regulations as may be necessary to procure the information hereby required.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP. I present the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. I understand that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] desires to address the Senate this morning on the rate bill, and if the report will not lose its place I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is a privileged one. It will be printed and lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 8, 14, 15, 16, 28, 29, 34, 44, and 59.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, 12, 13, 17, 22, 23, 25, 30, 31, 32, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 42, 47, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, and 57; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ninety," in the first line on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty;" strike out the word "ninety," in the fourth line of page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "or freedmen," on line 16 of page 2; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the word "date," in line 14, on page 3, down to and including the words "United States," on line 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, however, That the decision of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes on a question of fact shall be final;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "heirs," in line 24 on page 5, the following: "and in case any allottee shall die after restrictions have been removed, his property shall descend to his heirs;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "contests," in line 10 of the sixth page, the following: "pending before the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes or the Department of the Interior;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of section 6, commencing with line 11 on page 6, down to and including line 2 on page 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 6. That if the principal chief of the Choctaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribe, or the governor of the Chickasaw tribe, shall refuse or neglect to perform the duties devolving upon him, he may be removed from office by the President of the United States, or if any such executive become permanently disabled, the office may be declared vacant by the President of the United States, who may fill any vacancy arising from removal, disability, or death of the incumbent, by appointment of a citizen by blood of the tribe.

"If any such executive shall fail, refuse, or neglect, for thirty days after notice that any instrument is ready for his signature, to appear at a place to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior and execute the same, such instrument may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior without such execution, and when so approved and recorded, shall convey legal title, and such approval shall be conclusive evidence that such executive or chief refused or neglected after notice to execute such instrument.

"Provided, That the principal chief of the Seminole Nation is hereby authorized to execute the deeds to allottees in the Seminole Nation prior to the time when the Seminole government shall cease to exist."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "auction," in line 11, on page 9, the following: "or by sealed bids;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the Senate recede from the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "dissolution of the several tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, all records and files of said tribes" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the first day of June, nineteen hundred and six, all records and files of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes." And the House agree to the retention of the new matter added by the Senate, from line 4 to line 13, inclusive, on page 11; and as agreed to the amendment reads as follows:

"SEC. 9. That upon June 1, 1906, all records and files of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes shall, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be removed and deposited with such Government officer or officers as he may designate, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary respecting the removal, deposit, preservation, and inspection of such records. If any officer or member of any of said tribes, or other person having any of such records or files in his possession, fail or refuse to deliver in the manner directed by the Secretary of the Interior, or shall willfully mutilate or destroy any part thereof, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

"Upon dissolution of said tribal governments all causes then pending in any tribal court shall be transferred to the United States courts in Indian Territory by filing the papers therein with the clerk of the proper district, after which such causes shall proceed to final determination as if originally instituted in said United States court. The disbursements, in the sum of one hundred and eighty-six thousand dollars, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May thirty-first, nineteen hundred, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed: Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him."

Amendment numbered 26: That the Senate recede from the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "retaining," in line 9, on page 12, the following: "tribal educational officers, subject to dismissal by the Secretary of the Interior, and;" insert after the word "funds," in line 15, on page 13, the following: "Provided, That hereafter clerks and deputy clerks of United States courts in the Indian Territory who are ex officio recorders of recording districts in said Territory shall be allowed, out of the fees received for the recording and filing of instruments, twenty-five per cent in addition to the sum for compensation and actual expenses for clerk hire now provided by law;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27, incorrectly printed "21:" That the Senate recede from the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "five," in line 14, on page 14, the following: "and all such taxes levied and collected after the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and five, shall be refunded;" insert after the word "shall," in line 22, on page 14, the words: "willfully and fraudulently;" insert after the word "punish," in the second line, on page 15, the following: "by a fine of not exceeding five thousand dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "law," in line 12, on page 16, the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain and report by the opening of the next session of Congress if he can secure an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian tribes to have said coal lands set aside for school purposes, or report a plan for the sale and disposition of said lands;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "Secretary of the Interior is," in line 21 on page 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Principal chief of the Choctaw Nation and the governor of the Chickasaw Nation are, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior;" strike out the words "his direction," in line 24 on page 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The direction of the Secretary of the Interior;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 55: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Strike out the words "electric railway," in line 4, on page 29.

Insert the word "purchase" after the word "condemnation," in line 24, on page 29.

Insert, after the word "act," in line 11, on page 30, the following: "Provided, That the purchase from and agreements with individual Indians, where the right of alienation has not heretofore been granted by law, shall be subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior."

Strike out the words "electric railway," in line 12, page 30.

Insert after the word "Tribes," in line 9, on page 31, the following: "Whenever any such dam or dams, canals, reservoirs, and auxiliary steam works, pole lines and conduits are to be constructeed within the limits of any incorporated city or town in the Indian Territory, the municipal authorities of such city or town shall have the power to regulate the manner of construction therein, and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deny the right of municipal taxation in such cities and towns."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out lines 13 to 25, inclusive, on page 31, all of page 32, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, on page 33, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 26. That in addition to the powers now conferred by law, all municipalities in the Indian Territory having a population of over two thousand, to be determined by the last census taken under any provision of law or ordinance of the council of such municipality, are hereby authorized and empowered to order improvements of the streets or alleys, or such parts thereof as may be included in an ordinance or order of the common council, with the consent of a majority of the property owners whose property, as herein provided, is liable to assessment therefor for the proposed improvement; and said council is empowered and authorized to make assessments and levy taxes, with the consent of a majority of the property owners whose property is assessed, for the purpose of grading, paving, macadamizing, curbing, or guttering streets and alleys, or building sidewalks upon and along any street, roadway, or alley, within the limits of such municipality, and the cost of such grading, paving, macadamizing, curbing, guttering, or sidewalk constructed, or other improvements under authority of this section, shall be so assessed against the abutting property as to require each parcel of land to bear the cost of such grading, paving, macadamizing, curbing, guttering, or sidewalk as far as it abuts thereon, and in the case of streets or alleys to the center thereof; and the cost of street intersections or crossings may be borne by the city or apportioned to the quarter blocks abutting thereon upon the same basis. The special assessments provided for by this section and the amount to be charged against each lot or parcel of land shall be fixed by the city council or under its authority, and shall become a lien on such abutting property, which may be enforced as other taxes are enforced under the laws in force in the Indian Territory. The total amount charged against any tract or parcel of land shall not exceed twenty per centum of its assessed value, and there shall not be required to be paid thereon exceeding one per centum per annum on the assessed value and interest at six per centum on the deferred payments.

"For the purpose of paying for such improvements the city council of such municipality is hereby authorized to issue improvement scrip or certificates for the amount due for such improvements, said scrip or certificates to be payable in annual installments and to bear interest from date at the rate of six per centum per annum, but no improvement scrip shall be issued or sold for less than its par value. All of said municipalities are hereby authorized to pass all ordinances necessary to carry into effect the above provisions, and for the purpose of doing so may divide such municipality into improvement districts."

Insert after the word "taken," in line 18, on page 33, the words "within sixty days."

Strike out all of page 34 and lines 1 and 2 of page 35.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out lines 14 to 20 inclusive, on page 35, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the tribal existence and governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes or nations are hereby continued in full force and effect for all purposes authorized by law, until otherwise provided by law; but the tribal council or legislature in any of said tribes or nations shall not be in session for a longer period than thirty days in any one year: Provided, That no act, ordinance, or resolution (except resolutions of adjournment) of the tribal council or legislature of any of said tribes or nations shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States: Provided further, That no contract involving the payment or expenditure of any money or affecting any property belonging to any of said tribes or nations made by them or any of them or by any officer thereof, shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Change the numbering of the last section of the bill to read "SEC. 29."

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. PERKINS. If neither the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] nor the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] wishes to speak at this time, I will ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14171, being the bill making appropriations for fortifications.

Mr. MCCREARY rose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. PERKINS. I will withdraw my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California withdraws his request. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. President, the bill under consideration demands and should receive calm and serious consideration. It presents problems that are difficult to solve, and I shall try in a plain and practical way to discuss the merits and the issues involved.

We are living in the greatest age of the world's history, and our Republic ranks among the first, and is recognized as a world power. Progress, improvement, and advancement are seen everywhere throughout our country.

New conditions and general improvement require new laws. The pending bill is to meet the demands of the times. It is comprehensive in its bearing on industrial and commercial affairs and far-reaching in its effect on the interests of the people. It proposes legislation to regulate railroad rates for interstate transportation, and confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to investigate upon complaint a given rate, and if the rate is found to be unjust and unreasonable to establish a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative maximum rate in its stead, and enforce it.

Three national Democratic platforms have demanded legislation in principle similar to that contained in the bill under consideration. The President of the United States, in his last annual message, recommended railroad rate legislation on similar lines. The United States House of Representatives, composed of 386 Members, almost unanimously passed the bill under consideration, there being but seven negative votes, and the people, with a unanimity and enthusiasm unprecedented, are demanding legislation on the lines indicated.

The demand for railroad rate legislation on the lines set forth in the bill under consideration has been increasing. For years the people of the United States have been patient. They know that railroads have been and are of immense benefit, and that they are indispensable, and that their usefulness can scarcely be estimated, and that they have done more than any other industrial force for the enlightenment of our people and the development of our country. The people also know that they have rights, and that they have generously aided the railroads and made them profitable; that without their patronage and their products and their aid the owners of the railroads would be without profit or encouragement; therefore there should be justice and fairness to the people and justice and fairness to the railroads. Every producer and every shipper should be treated alike, and there should be "equal and exact justice to all, and special privileges to none."

IMMENSITY AND IMPORTANCE OF RAILROADS IN THE UNITED STATES.

If we deal with the railroad rate question fairly and justly, we will promote the happiness and prosperity of millions of people, and if we deal with it harshly and unfairly we may cause commercial and financial disaster almost beyond computation. There is no other business in our country which approximates the magnitude and importance of our railroad transportation system, and there is no country in the world in which railroads have so much power, employ so many men, require so much capital, have such earnings, expenses, and mileage as in our country.

There are more miles of railroads in the United States than there are in Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, and nearly one-half of the railroad mileage of the world is in our great country.

In fifty-five years the growth of the present railway system of the United States has been marvelous. It reached in 1850 only 9,021 miles. According to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of 1905 the total operated railroad mileage in the United States on June 30, 1904, was 212,243 miles. The gross earnings and income of the railroads in the United States for that year were $2,188,108,081, or about $6,000,000 per day; locomotives in the service of the railways, 46,743; total number of cars of all classes, 1,798,561; the number of persons on the pay rolls of the railways of the United States for that year was 1,396,121, and the wages and salaries paid to railroad officers and employees for the year 1904 was $817,598,810, and the par value of the amount of railway capital outstanding on June 30, 1904, was $13,213,124,679, representing the capitalization of $64,265 per mile for the railways in the United States, and paying an annual taxation of over $60,000,000.

When it is remembered that the total railway mileage in European Russia is 32,967; in Germany, 28,102 miles; France, 26,950 miles; Austria-Hungary, 22,634 miles; United Kingdom, 22,634 miles; Japan, 4,495 miles; China, 1,176 miles, and Africa, 15,560 miles, we see how far the United States leads the great nations of the world in railroad mileage and in immense power and influence of railroads.

RAILROADS IN AMERICA HAVE HAD FOUR AGES.

Mr. President, it has been well said that railways in America have had four ages, first, the age of construction, next the age of competition, then the age of combination, which is to be followed by the age, which the pending bill illustrates, of Government regulation, and we are also confronted by the fifth age known as Government ownership of railroads. I predict that if we do not meet this question at this time in a broad and just manner, the people will find some way to put upon the statute books more stringent and more radical laws, not only for Government rate making and Government regulation, but they may seek Government ownership of the great railroad lines conducting an interstate commerce business, so that while we are now confronted with Government regulation we may be confronted soon with Government ownership.

During the ages of construction of railroads and competition the people were much pleased with the improved conditions and with the great facilities furnished for travel and trade and commerce. They vied with each other in their aid to railroad building; cities and counties bonded themselves to raise money to build railroads; States gave liberal encouragement; the National Government appropriated 190,000,000 of acres of the public lands for the benefit of railroads, that they might extend their lines across our country from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The ages of construction and competition were succeeded by combination, and the people became justly alarmed, for the age of combination culminated, according to the statement of Hon. Martin A. Knapp, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission in seven large systems, known as the Vanderbilt, Hill, Harriman, Pennsylvania, Atlantic Coast, Southern, and Rock Island system, controlling 70 per cent of the entire mileage, and three-fourths of the traffic and of the earnings and of the valuations of our country's railroads, and the remaining 30 per cent, or about one-third of the mileage is made up of short systems absolutely dependent upon the main systems for existence and practically under their control.

Mr. President, in order to show how combination has superseded competition in the management of railways in the United States, I present the following analysis of railroad systems, which has been furnished me:

1. The Vanderbilt system, comprising the New York Central, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Michigan Central, the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, the Pittsburg and Lake Erie, and the Lake Erie and Western.

2. The Pennsylvania system, practically controlling the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, and the Norfolk and Western Railway, and holding jointly with the New York Central a controlling interest in the Philadelphia and Reading, which in turn controls the Central Railroad of New Jersey.

3. The Gould system, comprising the Wabash Railroad; the Missouri Pacific Railway; the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern; the Texas and Pacific; the St. Louis Southwestern; the International Great Northern; the Wheeling and Lake Erie; the West Virginia Central; the Denver and Rio Grande, and the Western Maryland.

4. The Harriman lines, including the Southern Pacific, Central Pacific, Union Pacific, Oregon Short Line, Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, with large interests in the Illinois Central, the Chicago and Alton, and Kansas City Southern.

5. The Hill system, embracing the Great Northern Railway, the Northern Pacific Railroad, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway.

6. The Rock Island system, including the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific; the St. Louis and San Francisco; the Chicago and Eastern Illinois, and the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf.

7. The Southern Railway system, the same interests controlling nearly all the important railways of the South.

Mr. President, it is clear to every thinking man that the time has come for more effective and broader supervision of common carriers. The great power of railroad corporations, the immensity of their business in every department, the fact that competition which prevailed in 1887 and which acted as a check and a restraint against unreasonable rates, has been to a great extent suppressed or destroyed, and that the tendency of railroads is toward consolidation into gigantic systems, and that the result of such consolidation will be the elimination of competition, which has done so much for the benefit of the people, makes it absolutely necessary for the Federal Government to assert its power and have government regulation as provided in the pending bill.

GOVERNMENT REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The movement in regard to Government regulation of railway rates is not a new movement. As far back as 1886 the Cullom Commission was appointed, and that Commission developed some remarkable and interesting conditions. The "act to regulate commerce" was enacted in 1887, and under that law the Interstate Commerce Commission proved very beneficial, and many of the evils which had existed before were abated or eradicated. For ten years the authority of the Commission to modify and reduce an established rate and to enforce a reasonable rate for the future was not questioned, but in 1897 the Supreme Court of the United States decided in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission against Texas and Pacific Railroad Company (167 U. S., 479) that no such authority had been granted the Commission by the act creating it.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, however, still had the power of investigation, and could hear complaints as to rates and declare whether the rate was unreasonable, but had no power to make its findings effective. Then came the passage of the Elkins Act in 1903, which aimed mainly at rebates and discriminations, but its enactment did not destroy rebates or give the full relief desired. In this connection I may say that the marvelous wisdom and foresight of the framers of the Federal Constitution again becomes conspicuous. Although at that time the steam engine had not been invented, and no one had ever dreamed of interstate commerce, by means of the greatest railroad system in the world, the framers of the Constitution furnished the basis for the legislation we are now seeking to enact by declaring, "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." Under this section of the Constitution it is clear that the founders of our Government placed the management of interstate commerce in all is branches under national control, and all that is required now is a proper law to enforce the declarations of the founders of our Government.

The bill under consideration provides—

First. That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property, which any such common carrier has established, and which are enforced at the time upon its route.

Second. That the Commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act, to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commissioners may need information.

Third. All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Fourth. That the power and scope of the Commission is extended over such subjects as private cars and refrigerators, terminals, private switches, elevator charges, and over the various devices now used to grant or secure rebates, drawbacks, or discriminations.

These provisions are important, but need no discussion; and they are subordinate to the great pivotal provision, which is the power given the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative maximum rate and make it effective.

I will read the section of the bill in full, which has been discussed so much and around which the contention with reference to rate regulation has been so strenuously raging:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation, to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. President, in support of the power granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the section just read, I call attention to the fact that all the great nations of the earth, except France and the United States, have adopted some Government system for the control of railroad rates.

In Great Britain the board of trade has control or regulates within certain limits the railroads.

Section 31 of the railway and canal traffic act (1888) provides that if a man thinks a railway is charging him an unfair or unreasonable rate for the goods he sends by it, or is in any way treating him in an unfair or unreasonable manner, he may complain to the board of trade, and that department, if the complaint seems reasonable, will call upon the railway for an explanation of its action. Further, the railway and canal commissioners, by section 10 of the same act, are empowered to hear and determine any dispute as to the legality of any toll, rate, or charge for merchandise traffic, and to enforce payment of so much as they decide to be legal.

In France the railroads are operated by private companies, which generally have concessions from the state or province.

In Germany, Russia, Italy, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and Belgium the railroads are mostly owned and operated by the government. There are some private lines, but they are under government control.

SUPREME COURT ON THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO DELEGATE RAILROAD RATE MAKING POWER TO A COMMISSION.

I shall not consume much time in demonstrating the right of the Government to regulate railroad rates. The railroads, which have so largely taken the place of the highways of ancient times and the public roads of modern times, although not built by the community, nevertheless perform the functions of the public highways, and those who operate them are common carriers.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in the case of Smyth against Ames (169 U. S. Reports, p. 467)—

A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is, therefore, under governmental control, subject, of course, to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. It may not fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public; but the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad were exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or of the services rendered, and in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders.

In the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company (167 U. S., 479) the Supreme Court of the United States, discussing the right of Congress to appoint a Commission to make railroad rates, said there were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rate, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates subject to regulations, restrictions, and the rule of common law that rates must be reasonable.

In the Interstate Commerce case just cited the question of the constitutional right of Congress to delegate to a commission a rate-making power is not directly involved, yet the court holds in the words of the opinion that "Congress may commit to some subordinate tribunal this power."

More than half the States of the United States have statutes delegating to commissions rate-making power. Cases arising under these statutes have repeatedly been in the district courts and circuit courts and the Supreme Court of the United States, and the courts have always held these statutes valid and constitutional. There are thirty-two State railroad commissions, twenty-four of which have power to make rates, as follows:

Alabama-Arkansas, after giving railroads ten days' notice.

California, are effective after twentieth day of service on railroads.

Florida, after giving notice and hearing all parties interested.

Georgia, joint rates can be made only after hearing, with thirty days' notice.

Illinois, after furnishing railroads with printed copies of schedule.

Indiana-Iowa, must give two weeks' notice after revising maximum rate.

Kansas, can raise rates only after six days' public notice.

Kentucky, after ten days' notice and hearings of railroads.

Louisiana-Maine, after due notice and hearing of railroads.

Minnesota-Mississippi, after ten days' notice to railroads.

Missouri, New Hampshire, and North Carolina, corporation commission, with powers to fix rates subject to right of railroads to file exceptions within ten days and be heard.

North Dakota, after notice to all parties and hearing.

South Carolina, thirty days' notice before rates become effective.

South Dakota, after ten days' public notice and hearing.

Tennessee, after ten days' notice to railroads.

Texas, after ten days' notice to all interested parties, with hearing. Emergency freight rates after three days' notice to railroads.

Mr. President, it has been asserted that if Congress is authorized to prescribe rates of international transportation it must be so by explicit enactment and can not delegate that power to a commission. There are many cases in which it has been held that a State statute regulating railroad rates and charges is constitutional. In the case of Stone v. F., L. & T. Co. (116 U. S., 307, 324, and 336) rates were fixed by a commission. This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. In this case not only the constitutionality of the statute, but the right to delegate the rate-making authority was presented.

In the case of New York and New England Railroad Company v. Bristol (161 U. S., 556–571) the court said:

Railroads are subject to such legislative control as may be necessary to protect the public against danger, injustice, and oppression, and this control may be exercised through a board of commissioners.

In the case of Georgia Banking Company v. Smith (138 U. S., 174) the State railroad commission law was attacked, and the Supreme Court of the United States said:

The supreme court of the State held, on application for an injunction, that this delegation of authority by the legislature to the commission to prescribe what shall be reasonable and just rates for transportation within its limits was a proper exercise of its own power to provide protection to its citizens against unjust rates and to prevent unjust discrimination; and it was expected, not that the legislature would itself make specific regulation as to what should in each case be a proper charge, but that it would simply provide the means by which such rates should be ascertained and enforced.

The statute of the State of Texas, which gave to the commission the right to fix and regulate railroad rates, was vigorously attacked, but the Supreme Court of the United States held, in the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 362), that the act was valid and constitutional, and that the commission created thereby was an administrative board exercising functions properly delegated.

In the same case the Supreme Court of the United States also said:

There can be no doubt of the general power of a State to regulate fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroads or other carriers and that this regulation can be carried on by a commission; such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislature.

There are many other cases, but to enumerate them would be tedious and unnecessary.

I think it is clear that if a State legislature can delegate railroad rate-making power to a commission and authorize the commission to determine and prescribe rates and regulations for railroads in the State, then the delegation by Congress of such authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission is lawful.

It has been well said that "the Supreme Court of the United States has settled as fully as anything can be settled by judicial decisions two propositions. First, that as to local commerce a State legislature directly or through the intervention of a commission has, subject to the limitation of the fourteenth amendment, the full rate-making power; second, that Congress has as full and complete power and control over interstate commerce as a State legislature has over local commerce, subject to the limitations of the fifth amendment, and that this includes the rate-making power as much in the one case as in the other."

Mr. President, the only limitation and check on the power of Congress is that contained in the fifth amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

Nor shall any person be deprived of property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

But this does not deprive Congress of the power to regulate. If Congress can not act through a commission, the power to fix rates is for all practical purposes of no avail. Congress as constituted, and as the business is conducted, can not manage the investigation and look after the numerous details involved in rate complaints.

THE MANNER AND CONDITION OF REGULATING RAILROAD RATES.

Assuming, therefore, that Congress has the right to prescribe rates or to delegate that power to a commission there only remains for consideration the manner and condition of that regulation. The bill under consideration prescribes the manner and condition by giving to the Commission the right, upon complaint against any rate, to determine if that rate is just and reasonable, and if not, to fix a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative maximum rate and to make the same effective.

There should also be strong and ample power for the enforcement of the law for the regulation of commerce, and the President in his last annual message represented public sentiment when he declared:

The Government must, in increasing degree, supervise and regulate the workings of the supervision of railways engaged in interstate commerce; and such increasing is the only alternative to an increasing of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other. The most important legislative act now needed, as regards the regulation of corporations, is this act to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to go at once into effect and stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

In our country at the present time we are confronted by three propositions:

Government regulation of railroad rates.

Government ownership of railroads.

Indorsement of existing railroad laws as being sufficient for the demands of the times.

I support the first proposition. In my opinion, the just and equitable way is for railroad companies to fix their own rates and charges and then, by proper legislation, the Interstate Commerce Commission be authorized and empowered to hear all complaints and determine what is a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate, and enforce it according to the provisions of the pending bill.

I believe that Congress has the power under the Federal Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and that Congress possesses under the power to regulate commerce the power to fix the rate of transportation, because transportation is commerce, and that Congress can delegate this power to fix rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission under a statute requiring the Commission to fix just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rates. The transportation of goods and passengers is, according to Justice Miller, commerce; and Chief Justice Marshall says:

To regulate commerce is to prescribe the rules by which commerce is to be governed.

There are some who say the bill is unconstitutional. I do not agree with them. The bill has been carefully considered by the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, all of whom are lawyers of ability and experience, and most of whom have had much experience in considering the questions presented in the bill. The bill has also been discussed and considered at length in the House of Representatives, and there are many able lawyers in that body, and I have confidence in the opinions of the Members of the House of Representatives and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who, with great unanimity, indorse the bill now under consideration.

NEITHER UNCONSTITUTIONAL NOR DISASTROUS.

The constitutionality of the bill can be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction after it becomes a law. If the bill is unconstitutional it should be known as speedily as possible, and if our Government is so limited by the Federal Constitution that it can not regulate interstate commerce in the manner provided in the bill so as to protect the rights of the people, then the Federal Constitution will have to be amended in the interest of the people. I believe, however, the act passed will be within the scope of the Constitution.

It has also been alleged that the passage of this act will bring disaster to railroads. I do not believe this. Disaster did not ensue in twenty-four States where railroad commissions exercised powers not only of regulation but also of limitation. Disaster did not follow the passage of the act to regulate commerce in 1887. During the ten years from 1887 to 1897, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission actually exercised the power of fixing rates, 45,000 miles of railroad were constructed in our country, and the fact that for eight years after the passage of the act of 1887, the railroad companies did not judicially challenge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates under that act, proves that they did not believe that they were seriously injured or hampered by the right of rate supervision then claimed and exercised.

President Ingalls, of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad Company, who is an authority on the management of railroads, and who has been connected for more than a quarter of a century with great and important lines of railroads, recently said:

I do not look for any unfavorable effect from Federal rate supervision on the earnings and conditions of the railroads.

It is a significant fact also that the gross earnings of the railroads of the United States in 1895 were $1,075,371,662, and the gross earnings in 1904 were $1,975,174,091, a net increase of $899,802,629, or an increase in nine years of 83 per cent, and that within that time the operating expenses increased from $725,720,415 in 1895 to $1,338,896,253 in 1904, being an increase of $613,175,838, or 84 per cent, and that the net earnings in 1895 were $349,651,047, and in 1904 were $636,277,838, an increase of $286,626,791, or 81 per cent. The increased receipts seem to be due mainly to the immense increase of business.

Mr. President, the bill under consideration, if it becomes a law, and I am sure it will with but few changes, will be beneficial in many respects, some of which I have already tried to enumerate, and it will also be beneficial because it will enable a test to be made as to the power of Congress over interstate commerce and common carriers, and it will give the people an adequate forum and a disinterested tribunal where upon complaint they can obtain redress from extortions or abuses in making of rates, and where the most powerful railroad officials will be subject to the same regulations as the humblest citizens.

REVIEW BY THE COURTS.

I present no objection to the right of review by the courts if it does not interfere with the authority of Congress in the matter of rates or hamper the Commission or defeat or render ineffective the lawful purposes and orders of the Commission, as provided in the pending bill.

The bill does not in express terms give the right of appeal or judicial review. Such right, nevertheless, it is believed, inheres and exists to an extent sufficient for all the purposes of justice. As the Interstate Commerce Commission is not a court, and appeals could not be taken in a judicial form from a lower to a higher court, therefore a judicial review of the rate fixed by the Commission would be obtained by an original action instituted in the circuit court of the United States, which court, if the matter in dispute exceeds $2,000, would have jurisdiction.

I agree with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who said in his very able and interesting speech:

As the grounds of judicial interposition are constitutional, there is in my judgment no necessity for embodying the right of judicial review in this bill. The right of judicial review exists by virtue of the Constitution, and a statute may not add to or subtract from it.

Mr. President, under the fifth amendment to the Constitution, unless the rates made by Congress or by the Interstate Commerce Commission were of such a character as deprived the companies of their property without due process of law or amounted to a taking of property for public use without just compensation, the courts could not interfere, and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was correct in saying that if the bill undertakes affirmatively to limit or deny the constitutional right of review, that provision of the bill would be void, although the other part of the bill might stand and be effective.

It is a matter of grave concern in considering this bill that by interlocutory orders in certain cases the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be suspended pending litigation, and in this way much delay may ensue, and reviewable as well as unreviewable orders of the Commission may be held in abeyance until final decree.

It has been said that the way to avoid this danger will be found in taking from the Federal courts, created by Congress, the right to suspend the orders of the Commission in all cases.

This can only be done, if it can be done at all, by depriving the court of its right to grant an interlocutory injunction in such cases, a right which we have been accustomed to believe is inherent in a court of equity upon a proper showing. If Congress can do this, would it be right to do it? Would it be a wise act? The authority of Congress in the matter of rates should not be interfered with and the lawful purposes and orders of the Commission should not be unnecessarily delayed or rendered ineffective and I want proper legislation on these lines. I have read with much interest the cases referred to by the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], relating to this question, and I now read an extract from the case of Sheldon et al. against Sill, in 8 Howard, page 448, which has been affirmed in a case in 18 Wallace and again reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 147 United States Reports:

That "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The second section of the same article enumerates the cases and controversies of which the judicial power shall have cognizance, and, among others, it specifies "controversies between citizens of different States."

* * * * * * *

Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court; consequently, the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

* * * * * * *

Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has been either directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary.

The case in 18 Wallace, the case of the Sewing Machine Companies, contains the following:

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Constitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Instead of taking away from the courts entirely this equity jurisdiction, would it not be better and fairer to all parties to provide that no interlocutory order should be issued by any court upon any ex parte affidavit or any ex parte petition without notice being given to the adverse party?

Mr. McCREARY. The Senator from North Carolina embodies in his question the substance of an amendment which, I understand, he will probably offer to the bill, and I have this to say about that amendment:

Of the amendments on the subject referred to which have been discussed, I regard the amendment offered or suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] as one of the best that I have heard. His amendment, as I understand, adds after the word "jurisdiction," in line 9, page 11, these words:

But no interlocutory order or decree shall be made by any court until ten days' notice shall be given to the adverse party, and until petition and answer filed, and a full hearing of the whole matter in controversy.

The bill now provides that after complaint has been made and after the Commission has determined and prescribed "what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged;" and after the Commission has made an order that "such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction."

Now, the Senator from North Carolina proposes to add there:

But no interlocutory order or decree shall be made by any court until ten days' notice shall be given to the adverse party and until petition and answer filed and a full hearing of the whole matter in controversy.

That would mean, of course, that the order of the Commission should remain in force until notice was given to the adverse party and until petition and answer filed and a full hearing of both sides. That is a very important amendment which has been suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. I never saw it until last night. I regard it as one of the best amendments that I have read or which has been suggested. But it is too important for me, upon short notice and before it has even been presented in the Senate, to come to any conclusion on it.

Mr. President, I do not regard this bill——

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky kindly tell me what that amendment is?

Mr. McCREARY. I read it before the Senator from New Jersey came in, but I will read it again.

Mr. KEAN. Has the amendment been offered or printed?

Mr. McCREARY. I stated that it had not been offered.

Mr. KEAN. Then it is a secret agreement?

Mr. McCREARY. There has been no agreement about it. It has been discussed a good deal, and the Senator from North Carolina informed me that he expected to introduce it.

Mr. KEAN. I should be glad to hear it read again.

Mr. McCREARY. He proposes to add, after the word "jurisdiction," in line 9 on page 11 of the bill, which the Senator will remember is that part of the bill where the order of the Commission is referred to and where it is said:

Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction—

He proposes to add these words:

But no interlocutory order or decree shall be made by any court until ten days' notice shall be given to the adverse party and until petition and answer filed and a full hearing of the whole matter in controversy.

That is the amendment to which I referred.

Mr. President, I do not regard this bill as free from criticism, but it is in the right direction, and it provides much needed legislation which time and experience will greatly improve. There are amendments which if adopted will improve the bill, but I desire it to be understood that whether the amendments are agreed to or not agreed to I shall vote for the bill under consideration, which has already passed the House of Representatives.

We have before us grave and important legislation. We are trying to solve a problem which has been growing in magnitude for years. We are face to face with a gigantic system, which though powerful is indispensable to our country's progress and development. There should be harmony and good feeling between the people and railroad corporations. They are mutually dependent the one upon the other, and there should be justice and fairness on both sides. There should be a thorough understanding between them as to their relations, their rights, and their interests.

I believe the passage of the pending bill will help to bring them more in harmony and accord, and this legislation will not injure a legitimate investment nor bring disaster to a solitary individual, but will solve problems and regulate interstate commerce in such a way as will please the people and help the rail roads to prosper.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss any phase of this question until a suitable time came for me to discuss every phase of it. But the suggestion which I made in the Senate something like ten days ago with respect to the power of Congress to limit the right of inferior Federal courts to issue preliminary injunctions has been so widely discussed and has been so pointedly assailed by some that I feel required to make not only a fuller statement of my views, but to bring to the attention of the Senate the numerous decisions of the highest court in this land sustaining in Congress the power which I have urged it to exercise.

If the matter had simply been discussed throughout the country, or if my view had only been combated in the Senate, I could very well defer my reply until I come to discuss all of the questions involved in the pending bill. But as it seems to me that there is a persistent and deliberate effort on the part of certain newspapers not only to make it appear that I have advanced an unconstitutional proposition, but also to make it appear that it is so obviously unconstitutional that a majority of the Senators with whom I have the honor to associate on this side of the Chamber have rejected it, I have determined to address myself to that question now.

Only this morning the Washington Post prints something like a column account of a social gathering at which it correctly says this matter was discussed, and then it incorrectly declares:

Senator BAILEY'S proposition to amend the bill so as to deprive the inferior courts of the power to issue restraining orders, pending judicial review of the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, did not develop the strength it had been thought it would have. This does not necessarily mean that the Texas Senator will not urge his proposed amendment, or even that Senator TILLMAN, as the floor leader for the majority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, will not support the Bailey proposition. The spirit of the discussion, however, seemed to indicate the likelihood that a majority of the Democratic Senators are not favorably inclined to Mr. BAILEY'S contention that Congress can deny to the courts the power to grant temporary injunctions.

Mr. President, I do not question that the reporter who wrote that believed it, but I deny that he had any sufficient reason for believing it. I am satisfied that he did not derive from any Senator any information upon which he could predicate that statement, because, as it is precisely the opposite of the truth, I assume that no Senator would give him such information. Whether the man who wrote that and similar articles is persistently and deliberately trying to create in the public mind the opinion that a majority of the friends of this legislation do not believe it competent for Congress to abridge the powers of the courts, or whether the reporter believes what he writes, is not material to the country. The material fact is that such publications are misleading and untruthful. It did not appear yesterday and it will not appear at any stage of this proceeding, when the matter is carefully and fairly considered, that a majority of this side will doubt or deny the power of Congress to abridge the jurisdiction of inferior Federal courts in the issuance of preliminary injunctions.

There has been an effort to argue that in some way, which my mind has never yet been able to comprehend, there is a difference between the power of Congress over what is known as the equity jurisdiction of the courts and the power of Congress over their jurisdiction in matters at law. I am not unmindful, Mr. President, that such an opinion has found a wide acceptance among the lawyers of the country, and I have heard it asserted repeatedly in my experience at the bar; but I have never known a good lawyer who did not, upon mature consideration, abandon it, no matter how frequently or how positively he had asserted it.

Sir, there is not one sentence, there is not one line, there is not one word in the Constitution which justifies an attempt to distinguish between the power of Congress over proceedings in equity and the power of Congress over proceedings at law in the inferior courts of the United States.

The third article of the Constitution invests the judicial power of the United States in these words:

> The judicial Power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services a Compensation which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The second section of the third article defines and distributes, so far as the Constitution itself distributes, the judicial power of the United States, and its language is this:

> Section 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

Of course, the Senate will recall that the eleventh amendment restricts the jurisdiction in suits against a sovereign State.

Following that definition of the judicial power and in the same section comes the only constitutional effort to distribute it, and it is expressed as follows:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Thus, Mr. President, we discover that the investiture of the judicial power, that the definition of the judicial power, and that the distribution of the judicial power are precisely the same with respect to the law as with respect to the equity powers of the courts; and no living man can find in those provisions any warrant for the claim that Congress may exercise a power over one which it can not exercise over the other. The power, whatever it may be, is exactly the same. It is conferred in the same sentence and in the very same words.

Mr. President, another remarkable contention must be maintained in order successfully to assail the amendment which I have suggested. The objectors must convince the Senate that while Congress has power to change the rule of decision, and may alter or repeal the rules of property which that court is charged to administer, it stands powerless to change a mere rule of practice. To state the proposition is to refute it.

Fortunately we are not left to decide this question upon the weight of such poor argument as I may be able to advance. Fortunately there is a line of decisions running from 4 Dallas to 106 U. S., in which this precise question has been considered by that court in more than a dozen cases, and decided by that court the same way in every case, and decided, too, by the unanimous judgment of the court. I do not believe that a power of Congress has ever before been doubted or denied in either House which has been so often, so unanimously, and so explicitly recognized and affirmed by the highest court of the Republic.

The first case—in fact, the first two cases—will be found in 4th Dallas. They were both decided in 1799, and some of those who made the law which those cases construed had participated in the convention which framed the Constitution under which the law was made. In the first judiciary act Congress provided that an injunction in certain cases should only be issued upon notice. In the case of New York v. The State of Connecticut this very question was passed upon by the court, and the court begins its brief opinion in these words:

> The prohibition contained in the statute, that writs of injunction shall not be granted without reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney extends to injunctions granted by the Supreme Court or the circuit court, as well as to those that may be granted by a single judge. (4 Dallas, p. 2, N. Y. v. Conn.)

Under the common law the court had what is now so freely described as the inherent power to issue an injunction without notice, but the lawmakers of that day said it should not be issued without notice, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained that statute.

Next comes the case of Turner v. The Bank of North America, also reported in this same volume, which contains the reports of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. These cases were decided before the seat of the Government was moved from the city of Philadelphia and while the same reporter for the Supreme Court of the United States served as the reporter for the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and the decisions of the two courts are printed in the first four volumes known as Dallas's Reports.

This very argument of the inherent power of the court to exercise the jurisdiction as defined in the Constitution was made at the bar in the case of Turner v. Bank of North America. The two attorneys who argued that case have left imperishable names at the American bar. One was Ingersoll and the other Rawle, the author of an excellent treatise upon the Constitution. In the course of his argument to the court Mr. Rawle asserted:

> It is, then, to be remarked—

And bear in mind, Mr. President, he was assailing the constitutionality of an act of Congress limiting the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and in support of that position Mr. Rawle pressed this argument:

> It is, then, to be remarked, that the judicial power is the grant of the Constitution, and Congress can no more limit, than enlarge the constitutional grant. In the second section of the third article, the Constitution contemplates the parties to the controversy as alone raising the question of jurisdiction, and if the existing controversy is "between citizens of different States" the judicial power of the United States expresly extends to it.

The reporter here incorporates a printer's mark and in a footnote he reproduces the queries addressed by the Chief Justice and by Judge Chase to the learned counsel. The query of the Chief Justice was in these words:

> How far is it meant to carry this argument? Will it be affirmed that in every case to which the judicial power of the United States extends the Federal courts may exercise a jurisdiction, without the intervention of the legislature, to distribute and to regulate the power?

Judge Chase interposed in this language, which was afterwards quoted with approval by the Supreme Court:

> The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution; but the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances)—

And he obviously refers there to the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States—> belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this court, we possess it, not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us, or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal. Besides, Congress is not bound, and it would, perhaps, be inexpedient to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject in every form which the Constitution might warrant.

I need not tell the Senate that Judge Chase was an ardent Federalist, ready always to assert the rights and powers of Federal courts. It will be remembered that he administered the alien and sedition laws with such severity in his court that the House of Representatives presented articles of impeachment against him before the Senate.

The question arose again in the case of the United States v.

Hudson, reported in 7th Cranch. Hudson was indicted under the common law for libeling the President and the Congress of the United States. He charged that Congress had voted and that the President had approved a payment to Napoleon of $2,000,000 for the French Emperor's permission to negotiate a treaty with Spain. For this publication he was indicted, and upon a demurer to the indictment the circuit court certified the question to the Supreme Court. In the course of its opinion the Supreme Court said:

Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only, the Supreme Court, possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution, and of which the legislative power can not deprive it. All other courts created by the General Government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to confer.

Here the court plainly and unequivocally lays down the doctrine that while Congress can not confer greater jurisdiction on the inferior Federal courts than is defined in the Constitution it can confer less.

Another case reported in this same volume is McIntire v. Wood. In that case they sought a mandamus to compel the register of a land office to issue final certificates of purchase, but the application as denied in the following language:

This court is of opinion that the circuit court did not possess the power to issue the mandamus moved for. Independent of the particular objections which this case presents, from its involving a question of freehold, we are of opinion that the power of the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Had the eleventh section of the judiciary act covered the whole ground of the Constitution there would be much reason for exercising this power in many cases wherein some ministerial act is necessary to the completion of an individual right arising under laws of the United States, and the fourteenth section of the same act would sanction the issuing of the writ for such a purpose. But although the judicial power of the United States extends to cases arising under the laws of the United States, the legislature have not thought proper to delegate the exercise of that power to its circuit courts, except in certain specified cases. When questions arise under those laws in the State courts, and the party who claims a right or privilege under them is unsuccessful, an appeal is given to the Supreme Court, and this provision the legislature has thought sufficient at present for all the political purposes intended to be answered by the clause of the Constitution which relates to this subject. (McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch, p. 504.)

The eleventh section referred to defined the jurisdiction of the court as to the cases of which it might take cognizance, and the fourteenth section authorized the circuit court to issue writs of mandamus only in cases where such writs were necessary to the exercise of such jurisdiction. The court thus held that writs of mandamus could be issued only as and when authorized by Congress.

The question arose again in the case of Cary v. Curtis, reported in the third volume of Howard's reports, and it is impossible to conceive a case more directly in point. I beg the Senate to listen while I read all of the opinion which relates to this particular question. Let us remember that they were contending in that court then, just as it is being contended in this Senate now, that the Federal courts derive their power from the Constitution and that Congress can not limit or abridge it.

It is contended, however, that the language and the purposes of Congress, if really what we hold them to be declared in the statute of 1839, can not be sustained, because they would be repugnant to the Constitution, inasmuch as they would debar the citizen of his right to resort to the courts of justice. The supremacy of the Constitution over all officers and authorities, both of the Federal and State governments, and the sanctity of the rights guaranteed by it, none will question. These are concessa on all sides. The objection above referred to admits of the most satisfactory refutation. This may be found in the following positions, familiar in this and in most other governments, viz: That the Government, as a general rule, claims an exemption from being sued in its own courts. That although, as being charged with the administration of the laws, it will resort to those courts as means of securing this great end, it will not permit itself to be impeaded therein, save in instances forming conceded and express exceptions. Secondly, in the doctrines so often ruled in this court that the judicial power of the United States, although it has its origin in the Constitution—

Precisely as every other power exercised by any other Department of this Government has its origin in the Constitution.

Although it has its origin in the Constitution, is, except in enumerated instances, applicable exclusively to this court dependent for its distribution and organization, and for the modes of its exercise entirely upon the action of Congress, who possess the sole power of creating the tribunals (inferior to the Supreme Court) for the exercise of the judicial power, and of investing them with jurisdiction either limited, concurrent, or exclusive, and of withholding jurisdiction from them in the exact degrees and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good. To deny this position would be to elevate the judicial over the legislative branch of the Government, and to give to the former powers limited by its own discretion merely.

It follows, then, that the courts created by statute must look to the statute as the warrant for their authority; certainly they can not go beyond the statute, and assert an authority with which they may not be invested by it, or which may be clearly denied to them. This argument is in no wise impaired by admitting that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Perfectly consistent with such an admission is the truth that the organization of the judicial power, the definition and distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction in the Federal tribunals, and the modes of their action and authority, have been, and of right must be, the work of the legislature. The existence of the judicial act itself, with its several supplements, furnishes proof unanswerable on this point. The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law. (Cary v. Curtis, 3 Howard, 244, 245, Rapalje's edition.)

The question arose next in the case of Sheldon et al. v. Sill, reported in the 8th volume of Howard. Here again they attacked the constitutionality of an act of Congress because it abridged the power of the Federal court. What answer did the court make to that contention? By a unanimous judgment they decided against it. The court in that case reiterated what it had said in the other cases, and absolutely declared that it would be tedious and unnecessary to review all the cases in which they had decided this precise question. Here is the language of the court:

It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained and established the inferior courts, and distributed to them their respective powers, they could not be restricted or divested by Congress. But as it has made no such distribution, one of two consequences must result: either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions. The first of these inferences has never been asserted and could not be defended with any show of reason, and if not, the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence. And it would seem to follow, also, that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court; consequently the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has been either directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary.

The court then addresses itself to the old case of Turner v. The Bank of North America, and quotes with approval the interruption of Judge Chase, to which I referred a few moments ago.

The next case is what is known as the Sewing Machine Companies case, and is reported in the 18th volume of Wallace's reports. The court there reiterates its former views in these words:

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Consitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction in controversies between party and party but such as the statute confers. Congress, it may be conceded, may confer such jurisdiction upon the circuit courts as it may see fit, within the scope of the judicial power of the Constitution, not vested in the Supreme Court, but as such tribunals are neither created by the Constitution nor is their jurisdiction defined by that instrument, it follows that inasmuch as they are created by an act of Congress it is necessary, in every attempt to define their power, to look to that source as the means of accomplishing that end. Federal judicial power, beyond all doubt, has its origin in the Constitution—

Exactly as all other Federal power has—

but the organization of the system and the distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction among such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish within the scope of the judicial power, always have been, and of right must be, the work of the Congress. (Case of the Sewing Machine Companies, 18 Wallace, p. 577.)

The question arose again in the case, the Insurance Company v. Dunn, reported in 19th Wallace. Here again they were assailing an act of Congress upon the ground that it abridged the power of the court, and this is the language of the court:

Of the constitutionality of this act we entertain no doubt. The question is not an open one in this court. A few remarks will be sufficient to dispose of the subject. The third article of the Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish, and that it shall extend, among other things, to "controversies" "between citizens of different States." As regards the inferior courts authorized to be established, Congress may give them such jurisdiction, both original and appellate, within the limits of the Constitution, as it may see fit to confer. How their appelate jurisdiction shall be exercised is not declared. The whole subject is reitted to the unfettered discretion of Congress. (Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wallace, p. 226.)

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Texas on that question, but in reading this morning I saw the expression, "courts have a natural equity jurisdiction." Suppose the act of Congress should give to a court jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the suitor, in order to protect his property, should ask for injunctive relief to save his property from irreparable injury. The court having been given jurisdiction over the subject-matter, can not the aid of equity be invoked to help adjust the rights fairly and equitably?

Mr. BAILEY. I will answer the Senator with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Fink v. O'Neil, reported in the 106th volume of U. S., and which presents even a stronger case than that suggested by him.

A judgment had been obtained by the United States against O'Neil and others, in the Federal court, and the marshal was proceeding to sell the homestead of O'Neil, which, according to the laws of Wisconsin, was exempt. It was contended, however, by the Government that exemptions could not be pleaded against a sovereign. That contention was admitted. But the court held that the law of Congress regulating the issuance of executions rendered it necessary to follow the law of Wisconsin, and that case distinctly and completely negatives this doctrine of inherent powers, as it is now asserted. It decides that Congress can regulate and limit the right of courts to issue final executions, and surely the Senator from North Carolina will concede that in doing that the court more than supports the view which I am presenting. Who can doubt that a power which can regulate and restrict the right to issue final executions to enforce judgments already rendered can also regulate and restrict the right to issue preliminary injunctions? I especially commend to the Senator from North Carolina this language of the court.

> This conclusion can not be avoided by the consideration which has been urged upon us, that the process acts do not limit the sovereign rights of the United States, upon the principle that the sovereign is not bound by such laws, unless he is expressly named. These laws are the expression of the sovereign will on the subject, and are conclusive upon the judicial and executive officers to whom they are addressed; and as they forbid the issue of an execution in every case, except subject to the limitations which they mention, and as there is no authority to issue an execution in any case whatever, except as conferred by them, the sovereign right invoked is left without the means of vindication. The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor, except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruit of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any of these steps except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department, for they can exercise no jurisdiction except as the law confers and limits it.

What does the Senator from North Carolina say to that statement?

Mr. OVERMAN. As I stated I am inclined to agree with the Senator, and must confess that the authority he reads rather confirms me that he is right in his contention.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I do not wish to disturb the Senator right now, but——

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to invite his attention to a point, and the way it impresses me in order, if it does not disturb his line of argument, that he may explain the doubt or difficulty that is in my mind. It seems to me that the line of cases he has been citing and has been reading from go to establish, first, the propositions that in the matter of the distribution of power among the courts that Congress shall create it is purely within the discretion of Congress whether or not it will invest a court it creates with this jurisdiction or with that. In other words, Congress may say whether the courts shall exercise jurisdiction in a particular case or not, and then, vesting it with the jurisdiction, it may prescribe the manner of practice and the mode of proceeding. But that goes simply to regulating the practice, which we all understand differs entirely from the real questions at issue or the real merits of the controversy. The manner of conducting a trial, the mode of practice, is one thing; the real heart of the controversy is another.

By the Constitution judicial power is vested in the courts—the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time create. Judicial power extends to cases at law and in equity. Now, if judicial power extends to cases in equity, and a party has a case in equity, and the Congress says that a case in equity shall be tried before this court, the question I ask the Senator is this: Is not that party entitled, being relegated to that forum, to have his case in equity tried according to the law in such manner as will protect his constitutional rights.

Mr. BAILEY. According to the law of Congress; that is my answer.

Mr. FULTON. But suppose that law of Congress——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me to finish reading this quotation probably it will afford him a better answer.

Mr. FULTON. I was going to ask for information, if the Senator will permit me a moment——

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. Suppose the law of Congress says a circuit court can try this case in equity, but it can give no relief; could Congress do that?

Mr. BAILEY. Of course it could. Congress could abolish every inferior court in the United States to-morrow.

Mr. FULTON. True; but suppose it gives a court of equity jurisdiction, can it deny that court power to grant relief?

Mr. BAILEY. It only gives it jurisdiction to be exercised in such manner as Congress prescribes.

Mr. FULTON. Suppose it does——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish this.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

Mr. BAILEY. I want the Senator to hear this. I see the Senator has not examined this case.

Mr. FULTON. I do not know that I have read that case.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has not, for if he had examined it he is too good a lawyer to have missed its point. It decides that Congress gave the court the power to hear and determine the cause; to render a judgment, and yet it could not issue execution on that judgment except in the manner Congress had provided. If there is any power more inherent in a court than all others, except alone the power to punish for contempt, it is the power to issue execution to enforce its judgment; and yet the court has expressly declared, in the opinion from which I have just read, that Congress can limit or destroy that power. The court continues beyond what I had read, when interrupted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], and repeats the declaration of Justice Daniel in the case of Cary v. Curtis. It proceeds as follows:

> And if the laws in question do not permit an execution to issue upon a judgment in favor of the United States, except subject to the exemptions which apply to citizens, there are no others which confer authority to issue any execution at all. For, as was said by Mr. Justice Daniel in Corey v. Curtis (3 How., 236, 245), the courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by common law.

Can the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from Oregon ask for authority more directly in point. The Federal court had heard and determined the case, and yet no execution could issue except in the manner which Congress had prescribed.

Mr. FULTON. Now, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I will say to the Senator it seems to me that the distinction between that case and the one we have in mind is this: What property shall be subject to execution after a judgment shall be rendered is purely a matter of public policy, to determine which power is reposed in the legislature; and, of course, the legislature can limit that, but the Constitution directly and specifically protects citizens in the enjoyment of certain rights. One of those is that their property may not be taken without due process of law. There is a constitutional prohibition against certain action.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator——

Mr. FULTON. In a moment.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. FULTON. Congress establishes a court and gives to that court the power to try suits in equity. One of the known powers of equity, indeed the strong arm of the court of equity since its foundation, clear back to the very organization of courts of equity, is the power of injunction to prevent a threatened injury. Therefore, in this case, the Constitution prohibits the taking of property without due process of law, and prevents the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. A party comes into court and says, "They are taking my property without due process of law, they are taking it and appropriating it, and now I appeal to the court to protect me by an injunction," and you answer, "It is true the Constitution has said that your property may not be appropriated and you may not be deprived of it, except by due process of law or having just compensation, yet the Congress has rendered the court powerless to prevent it because we can not issue an injunction." Now, then, can Congress accomplish indirectly what it can not do directly? Can it so provide that a citizen may be deprived of his property without due process of law or without just compensation by directly depriving the courts of power to issue a writ of injunction?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the very section of the Constitution which the Senator invokes, the due process of law provision, declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Does the Senator from Oregon hold that it violates that constitutional provision for the Government to arrest a man and confine him in jail to await the final judicial determination of whether he is guilty or not? They do that nearly every day. They arrest a man upon a charge, they imprison him upon an indictment to await judicial determination of his guilt or innocence. All I ask is that when the railroad commission says "this is a fair rate," that it shall stand until a full judicial inquiry has been made and an ascertainment of its injustice found. Will the Senator contend that the rights of property are more sacred than personal liberty of the citizen?

Mr. FULTON. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. Then he is not right——

Mr. FULTON. A railroad is entitled to exactly the same right that any citizen has.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course, but——

Mr. FULTON. And we can not make a different rule applicable to the railroad on the trial of its case than we can make applicable to any citizen. They are entitled to equal protection under the law.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator confuses the fifth amendment with the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. There is no constitutional guaranty of the equal protection of the law by the Federal Government. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution forbids a State to deny the equal protection of its laws to any person within its jurisdiction, but the fifth amendment, which controls this matter, imposes no such limitation upon the power of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BAILEY. When I finish my reply to the Senator from Oregon I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

I contend that it is an affront to the common sense of the American people to tell them that under the law a citizen may be apprehended upon a mere charge and lodged in prison to await the action of the grand jury, and then upon an indictment he may be kept incarcerated in jail to await a judicial inquiry into his innocence or guilt—that all of this may be done without violating the citizen's guaranty against the deprivation of his liberty without due process of law; and yet that it deprives a railroad of its property to compel it to wait for a full and fair judicial inquiry. The railroad, like everybody else, is entitled to a trial, but they can be made to wait for a full and fair trial.

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator seems to have passed, for the time being at least, the consideration of the point to which I desired to direct an inquiry; and that was as to the source of the power vested in the Supreme Court and in the other courts of the United States. It is, perhaps, the primary question for consideration in determining how much and of what character the review in this case shall take, or rather how much power of review shall be given and the character that it shall take.

I understood the Senator to say—I may have misunderstood him—that whatever power the Supreme Court had it derived from Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, in substance.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I did not say it in substance. I did not approach saying it in substance or in shadow. The Senator probably has used the words "Supreme Court" when he meant the inferior courts.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I was going to call the attention of the Senator and the Senate to the language in reference to the two classes of courts and to the construction that Justice Story placed upon that language in the Virginia case of Martin v. Hunter.

Mr. BAILEY. I am familiar with that case. I know enough of it to know that it does not apply to this question at this point.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, if the Senator does not desire to be interrupted, I will not interrupt him, but I will reserve the presentation of this idea until I can do it in my own time. It seemed, however, to be pertinent to the consideration that the Senator was giving to the question at that time.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Idaho for that purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question has been made, you might say, taken up or mooted, several times, and Senators have expressed themselves upon this principle, and it seems to me that we might just as well give it a little consideration at this time in passing. There is no other case reported that so clearly draws the distinction between the divided—we may say divided—jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court as does this case of Martin v. Hunter, in which Justice Story had under consideration the direct question as to the character of its jurisdiction, and he expressed it in this way. The question was whether or not Congress was bound to confer the jurisdiction upon the inferior courts that is provided for in section 2 of Article III of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court held it was not optional with Congress to create these courts and establish their jurisdiction, but that Congress must do it. That is what Justice Story says. Here is his language:

> Let this article be carefully weighed and considered—

Referring to this article of the Constitution—

> Let this article be carefully weighed and considered. The language of the article throughout is manifestly designed to be mandatory upon the legislature.

They spoke of Congress as the legislature in those days, as they did all through the proceedings of the convention that framed the Constitution.

> Its obligatory force is so imperative that Congress could not, without a violation of its duty, have refused to carry it into operation.

That is, this power of creating such inferior courts as Congress was authorized to create by the Constitution and prescribe their jurisdiction. The court says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested—

Those last three words being italicized—

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested (not may be vested) in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish.

Those are the courts that are to have original jurisdiction for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the legislation which is proposed at this time—those inferior courts that Justice Story says it is obligatory upon Congress to create, not optional. Then he proceeds:

> Could Congress have lawfully refused to create a Supreme Court, or to vest in it the constitutional jurisdiction?

The principal subjects of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court are not to be vested in it by Congress, but they are vested in it in specific terms by the Constitution. But, in addition to that power, Congress may invest the Supreme Court with certain powers and functions both as to the power to hear and determine, as well as to the manner of doing it. Justice Story says further:

> The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold—

And he emphasizes it—

> their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times—

Mr. BAILEY. I do not really want that case injected into my speech, because the Senator misapprehends what Judge Story meant. Judge Story merely meant that it was the duty of Congress to do this, but he did not mean that, if Congress did not do it, there was any power in the courts to enforce it. I will thank the Senator to withhold that decision.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will only say then—and I shall not interrupt the Senator longer than to say it—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the Senator yielded for the purpose of allowing me to round out what I was going to say.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to say that I think upon a proper occasion I shall be able to make clear to the mind of the Senator from Texas that Justice Story did mean to say just what I say he meant to say; and I shall take occasion to inject this decision into the argument, because it is a complete answer to the position that the Senator has taken this morning.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Idaho thinks what he says, but upon a better reflection he will change even his mind about that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. The truth of it is——

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator will yield long enough for me at least to answer that reflection.

Mr. BAILEY. That is no reflection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it is that class of reflection that is intended, and succeeds in bringing a little laugh from the galleries. The Senator from Idaho is not a novice in the consideration of these questions, and is entitled to be considered as understanding, or, at least, is presumed to understand, these legal questions perhaps as well as his juniors at the bar.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, it is not age that determines wisdom. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not intend to engage in a political discussion as to whether it was the duty of Congress to confer upon the courts all the jurisdiction which the Constitution authorizes it to confer. I am confining myself to the judicial contention that the inferior courts can exercise no power not conferred upon them by Congress.

The Senator from Idaho, I take it, will not complain that the present law denies the right of a suitor to resort to a Federal court where less than $2,000 is involved; and yet the Constitution says the jurisdiction "shall extend to all cases,"—not to all cases involving $2,000 and more, but "to all cases." The original judiciary act drew the line at $500, but the Constitution draws no line; it fixes no limitation upon the jurisdiction of the Federal courts according to amount; but every judiciary act in the history of the Government has recognized the power of Congress to exclude from judicial cognizance in the Federal courts cases below a certain amount.

Now, Mr. President, I return from this digression to the question whether Federal courts have inherent powers. That they have inherent powers in a sense is true; that is, if you create a Federal court, and do not expressly forbid it to exercise certain powers, it possesses them by virtue of its creation. Such is the power to issue an execution to enforce its judgment; such is the power to punish summarily for contempt; and yet the books are full of cases which affirm the power of Congress to prohibit this right of the court to issue execution or to punish for contempt, except according to the statute.

When the Supreme Court expressly has decided that Congress can regulate the power of a circuit court to issue an execution, in God's name how can a lawyer contend that Congress can not regulate the right of that court to issue a mere interlocutory decree? How vastly more important to the due administration of justice that the court shall issue executions to enforce its final and deliberate judgment than it is that they issue a mere interlocutory decree! The opinion which holds that Congress can prescribe and limit the court's right to issue executions was unanimous. It was not by a vote of 5 to 4 nor 6 to 3, but all—the entire court—concurred in saying that the courts of the United States have no inherent power to enforce their own judgments against the limitations imposed by the act of Congress.

But, Mr. President, conclusive as that, in my judgment, is, there is yet a stronger case. In 19th Wallace is reported the case of Ex parte Robinson, and here is the language of the court, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Field:

> The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings, and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power. But the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 2, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts; whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may perhaps be a matter of doubt. But that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted.

Can anything be plainer? The court declares the power to punish contempt is inherent in all courts; and yet it sustains a most important abridgment of that power. When it describes the power to punish for contempt as inherent the court plainly and only means that it is power which the court possesses by virtue of its creation, but which may be limited and controlled by statute.

Mr. President, within the memory of all here the Senate has passed, by a practically unanimous vote, a bill to take from the courts of the United States the power to punish summarily in all cases of constructive contempt, and to confer upon the citizen so accused the right of a trial by jury. That was when the labor organizations of the country were protesting against the denial of the right of a trial by jury through the agency of the Federal courts, which issued injunctions in order that they might punish summarily for contempt, instead of trying men by a jury for conspiracy. This matter had reached a stage of such gross abuse that, as I recall it, the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, at the head of which then stood the venerable Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, long honored for his great learning not only in the Senate but throughout the entire country, preceived the necessity of some check.

My recollection is that a unanimous report from the Judiciary Committee affirmed the power of Congress to withdraw from the Federal court the right to punish for constructive contempt, and committed such offenses to trial by a jury of the country. Senators concede the power of Congress to restrict and control the issue of execution; they concede the power of Congress to restrict and control the right to punish for contempt, yet they deny the power of Congress to regulate the issuance of preliminary injunctions. The court says that the act of 1831 limited the power of all Federal courts to punish for contempt, and yet it holds that act to be a valid exercise of the power of Congress.

That act of 1831 has a curious history. A Missouri judge punished a St. Louis lawyer oppressively and unjustly for criticising through the public press some of his opinions. He proceeded so outrageously and so oppressively that the spirit of self-respect and love of justice, which dominates always the American bar, revolted, and they brought the conduct of the judge to the attention of the House of Representatives, where they asked that he be impeached in the name of justice. The House preferred articles of impeachment against him. The Senate tried him. Of course the Senate acquitted him. Except in two instances it has acquitted every man who has been tried upon articles of impeachment, and of the two excepted cases one was a crazy man while the other was absent. They tried Judge Peck. He was acquitted, but his conduct was so monstrous and unjust that the American Congress testified its abhorrence of the abuse of the power to punish for contempt by enacting the law of 1831. That act has passed under judicial review in other cases, and has been sustained. In the case of Savin, reported in 131 U. S., the court declared:

> The act of 1789 did not define what were contempts of the authority of the courts of the United States in any cause or hearing before them, nor did it prescribe any special procedure for determining a matter of contempt. Under that statute the question whether particular acts constituted a contempt, as well as the mode of proceeding against the offender, was left to be determined according to such established rules and principles of the common law as were applicable to our situation. The act of 1831, however, materially modified that of 1789, in that it restricted the power of the courts to inflict summary punishments for contempt.

Again, in the same volume and in almost the very next case, where Cuddy was the petitioner, the court said:

> The only effect of this limitation is to narrow the field for the exercise of their general power, as courts of superior jurisdiction, to punish contempts of their authority.

Mr. President, it is neither true as a matter of law, nor is it true as a matter of fact, that I am seeking to deprive any railroad of its property without a just compensation. All I am contending for is that the rate which the Commission, after a full hearing, has said is a fair one shall stand until condemned by the final judgment of a court upon a full investigation of the case.

What rate is more apt to be just and fair—the rate fixed by the railroad, inspired by its selfish desire to increase its earnings, or the rate established by an impartial tribunal? The railroad managers, under their view of their duty and their situation do not owe as much to the public in the way of just rates as they owe to their stockholders in the way of dividends and profits.

Let us suppose that they have abandoned the old, remorseless, and indefensible rule of laying all that the traffic will bear, and that they now employ the juster practice of demanding only a fair compensation for their service. Let us assume that they are both honest and diligent in striving to arrange their charges with a view of doing justice to the public as well as to their stockholders, we can not still be blind to the fact that the men who fix those rates have a selfish interest which will lead the most enlightened and most upright among them to favor themselves against their patrons.

On the other hand, here is a great Commission constituted by the law, composed of men of high character and great ability, charged with the high duty of doing justice—justice alike to the railroad and to the shipper. No thought of self enters into their calculation; all they do is done in the name of the Government and for the sake of justice. And yet we are told that the rates fixed by such a tribunal may be and perhaps ought to be suspended by a judge and the railways left to collect the rate imposed by their own selfishness and measured too often by their own greed.

Again, Senators, I put the question to you—what rate is more apt to be right—the one fixed by the railroad or the one fixed by the Commission? If the rate fixed by the Commission is more apt to be right, in the name of justice and on behalf of the people, I demand that that rate shall stand until finally adjudged by the court to be unjust.

They tell us that we ought not to confer this rate-making power on the Commission because it is a task of surpassing difficulty and delicacy. I agree that it is a difficult and delicate task. I agree that it ought to be performed only by men qualified for such a work; and yet with an argument like that on their lips they demand that a Federal judge, who, though he may know everything about the law may know nothing at all about freight rates, shall have the right to set aside a schedule fixed by a commission of experts, and that he may do so upon an ex parte hearing and without any investigation of the case.

Ah, Senators, you had better be candid with the people. If when they ask for bread you intend to give them a stone, be brave and honest with them and refuse to give them anything. Give what they want or give them nothing, and let us try this issue anew before that great jury of American voters.

That the courts will abuse the power which you propose to leave with them is a moral certainty. Mr. President, I have here a letter written to me by a reputable lawyer in the State of Florida, whose knowledge especially qualifies him to speak upon the subject, and I ask the Senate to hear how a Federal judge has despised and trampled upon the plainest principles of justice. This lawyer says:

The Florida railroad commission enforces its orders by mandamus instituted originally in the supreme court of the State, and yet Judge Pardee has enjoined the Florida railroad commission and all of the State officials from instituting suit in the supreme court of the State by mandamus to compel the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to reduce its passenger fare from 4 cents to 3 cents per mile in Florida, and this injunction was granted upon the affidavit of the vice-president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad to the effect that the Louisville and Nashville property in Florida is worth at least $5,200,000—this high valuation being essential to their case—and the State produced an affidavit made by the same man one month and twenty-eight days prior to his swearing to the bill, in which affidavit he had sworn that the identical property was not worth exceeding $1,700,000; and yet on this man's affidavit the State was temporarily restrained from instituting mandamus proceedings in the supreme court of Florida to enforce compliance with the rate.

Not only, Mr. President, has this inferior Federal court denied the right of the State to enforce an unjust rate, but they have restrained the State from resorting to its highest court to settle the question of whether a given rate is just or not; and that restraining order was issued upon the bill of the railroad, sworn to by its vice-president. Because I seek to withhold from a judge an oppressive and extraordinary power like that, shall I be arraigned before the country and charged with having proposed to violate the Constitution, and to deprive a carrier of its property without the due process of law?

Mr. President, I have no desire to oppress the railroads. My whole object is to prevent the railroads from oppressing the people, and that I believe to be the unanimous desire of Senators who sit on this side of the Chamber. I do not know what view others may take about this question, but if I stand alone I intend to submit to the Senate the question whether it will allow a Federal court to exercise such an arbitrary, extraordinary, and oppressive power as has been exercised by Judge Pardee, as related in the letter which I have read. It can do no man any harm, or at least it can do no man any injustice, to say that until there shall be a full and fair judicial determination of the question, the rate established by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be the lawful one.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the views of the Senator from Texas, he is in favor of having a full and fair judicial determination finally of the question whether the rates fixed furnish just compensation or not?

Mr. BAILEY. I am. I have never seen the hour, and I sincerely trust I will never see the time, when I can be clamored into closing the doors of the courts against any person, natural or corporate. The right to a trial is not only sacred under the Constitution, but it was sacred before the Constitution was adopted. If you could destroy the Constitution, and if by burning its parchment you could release us from our obligation to obey its limitations, I should still stand here contending for the right of every man to have his day in court. But, Mr. President, the right to a day in court, the right to have a fair and an impartial trial, does not embrace the right of allowing an arbitrary Federal judge to set aside without sufficient inquiry the deliberate judgment of a competent and impartial board.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and every other Senator in this Chamber, I trust, credits me with a proper respect for the law. I not only respect the law, but I respect the courts, and I sometimes think I go too far in yielding my own opinion to theirs. That I should yield obedience to their decrees is to be expected, but I doubt if good citizenship requires us to receive their reasoning as conclusive, although we must accept their conclusions as binding.

After all the judge, when elevated to the bench, is still the same man, with the same infirmities and limitations, both of character and intellect, that he was when he sat in the Senate or served his country in an humbler sphere. I believe that the man who for selfish or political purposes creates a distrust of the courts does his country an irreparable injury; and yet the injury he does is not half so great as the injury done by that man who would teach us a debasing belief in the infallibility of courts.

Courts make mistakes; they make honest mistakes; and self-respecting American citizens are entitled to examine them and candidly to express their opinion about them. While I rejoice to say that I do not believe there is to-day a man on our Supreme Bench who would prostitute his great office to an unworthy purpose, I do not extend that confidence to the entire judiciary of the United States. I frankly declare my belief that there are inferior judges who will abuse this great power if you leave it with them, and therefore I insist that it shall be taken from them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has kindly called my attention to two opinions of the Supreme Court which the Senator from Texas has not quoted.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say that there are not less than six or eight which I have not quoted. I would not have the Senate or the Senator suppose that I have exhausted all of them, because there are still six or eight, all affirming the doctrine, which decisions I could have laid before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. We want to put that doctrine or heresy or whatever it is to sleep. So we will pile up opinions. Here is one from the Sewing Machine case, October term, 1873 (18 Wallace, 577):

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Constitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction in controversies between party and party but such as the statute confers. Congress, it may be conceded, may confer such jurisdiction upon the circuit courts as it may see fit, within the scope of the judicial power of the Constitution, not vested in the Supreme Court, but as such tribunals are neither created by the Constitution nor is their jurisdiction defined by that instrument, it follows that inasmuch as they are created by an act of Congress, it is necessary, in every attempt to define their power, to look to that source as the means of accomplishing that end. Federal judicial power, beyond all doubt, has its origin in the Constitution, but the organization of the system and the distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction among such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, within the scope of the judicial power, always have been, and of right must be, the work of the Congress.

Here is another, from 147 United States, October term, 1892:

It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained and established the inferior courts and distributed to them their respective powers they could not be restricted or divested by Congress; but, as it has made no such distribution, one of two consequences must result—either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court, or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions. The first of these inferences has never been asserted, and could not be defended with any show of reason, and if not, the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence. And it would seem to follow also that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jusisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all. (Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S., p. 158.)

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I agree with the conclusion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] as to the thing to be done. The first consideration which confronts us is how to do it; what will effectuate the purpose to be accomplished. That is the important question at this time. I think there is practically a unanimity of opinion here that there is to be legislation which will authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and regulate railroad tariff rates. I think that is agreed upon. I think there is an overwhelming sentiment, not only in this body, but in the country, that this shall be done.

Now, when we face a proposition of that kind, the first thing is to determine what we can do; to determine the extent of our power. Any cautious man in entering upon an enterprise, whether it be business or whether it be of this character, must first know the limitations that surround him.

I believe that Congress can invest the Interstate Commerce Commission with power to fix rates for transportation companies doing an interstate business; I believe that as an abstract proposition. But that is not the whole question. The question then is, To what extent shall we exercise this power? and that must be followed by, In what manner will we exercise it? It is, I think, conceded that the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be vested with the power of fixing maximum rates of transportation. The difference of opinion seems to center around the method of exercising that right—the details. That the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission can be made final I do not believe for a moment. In the absence of any legislation on our part, the Supreme Court of the United States has the inherent power to enforce or protect the personal rights and the property rights conferred by the Constitution upon the individual or the combination of individuals. It has that inherent right. We can neither extend it nor take it away from the court.

For convenience we have established minor courts, but if we were to abolish them to-day, we could not destroy the right that is given to the people under the provision of the Constitution which creates the third of the coordinate branches of the Government. We appeal to the circuit courts to-day because we have created them as a medium of convenience, but had we not created them, the enforcement of the rights of the individual would have remained where the Constitution placed it—in the Supreme Court; and if the rights of the individual were invaded, in the absence of other courts the party whose rights were thus invaded would go into the Supreme Court for their enforcement. Otherwise what function does this third of the coordinate branches of the Government perform? It would be a mere name. Its powers are defined and its purpose is defined in the Constitution.

Section 1 of Article III says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

The first is an absolute grant and creation of power. The second clause of the sentence is an alternative one, resting upon the action of Congress. Then section 2 says:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity—

What judicial power? The judicial power which has just been vested in the Supreme Court of the United States.

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party—

We are proposing by this legislation that the United States shall be a party in every case of litigation. We are providing that the controversies shall be between the United States and the shipper, so that this second section of Article III of the Constitution has a direct reference to the class of cases that we are providing for.

> To controversies between two or more States; between the State and the citizens of another State; between citizens of different States.

Enumerating the jurisdiction that is conferred by the Constitution, that jurisdiction, so far as the United States Supreme Court is concerned, is vested by the Constitution and Congress can neither extend it nor diminish it. It is coordinate in authority with us. It derives no part of its virility, no part of its existence, none of its power from a coordinate branch. Its powers were conferred by the Constitution.

But the same sections of the Constitution provide that we may create other courts and that we may confer jurisdiction upon them. That was merely the exercise of farsight, that as the country grew and controversies multiplied it would be necessary to relieve this main tribunal of the burdens of interpreting and applying the law in all cases in all parts of the country. The necessity was so obvious that it was left to Congress to deal with as a growing proposition.

Now, Mr. President, as to this right and the manner of exercising it, as has been suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], there is a clamor which goes to the extent of demanding that we shall deprive the litigants in these controversies over the reasonableness and unreasonableness of a freight rate of the right to appeal to a court to determine whether or not the parties are within their legal rights. That is the clamor. We are not here to yield to public clamor. We are here to exercise a responsible judgment, to be guided by the individual intelligence that is possessed by each member of this body. We are here to legislate within the limitations of our constitutional rights. We are here to give heed to the call of the people, but we are not here to be led beyond the lines of our power or our jurisdiction by reason of any call or clamor.

Without any legislation upon this question an individual who had been wronged or deprived of his right to fair treatment at the hands of a common carrier had a right to go into the courts of either the United States or the State and recover damages against the party infringing his rights. That was his common-law right. The statute added nothing to the right of a party who had been wronged in this way.

Mr. President, all that the statute did was to provide the method, to provide the machinery for more conveniently exercising the right of the individual. The proposition to-day, crystallized, is, "Shall we make a more adequate provision for the enforcement of a right that existed at common law?" That is all there is before this body or before Congress in regard to this class of legislation. The question is, Shall we provide a more adequate manner, a more convenient method for the enforcement of a right that has always existed under civilized government such as ours, and if we shall, to what extent shall we go?

Now, the courts have the inherent constitutional power to enforce their orders. Having jurisdiction, we can not deprive a court that has jurisdiction of a subject-matter by virtue of the Constitution of the right to enforce its decrees. Cases have been read, instances have been cited, where courts have said, in speaking of the particular case before us, that it had or had not the right because Congress had or had not given it the power. But those cases are to be distinguished from a case where the subject-matter of the controversy is whether or not the party is being deprived of his constitutional right.

Of course, as every lawyer knows, you must in every instance know the subject-matter before the court before you can correctly apply or interpret the decision of the court. Some of the cases that have been read this morning were cases where the matter in controversy was not the determination of the rights the individual or the party litigant had under the Constitution, but were cases where the subject-matter of the controversy was a statutory right that had been conferred subject to the statutory limitations contained in the act.

Mr. President, legislation upon the subject of the regulation of commerce between the States is rather a forced consideration. The framers of the Constitution never for a moment dreamed that that provision would be used for the purposes for which we are seeking to use it to-day. There were no railroads, and there was no question of rates before the people. The discussion in the Constitutional Convention centered around the question whether or not the people of one State should be allowed to impose a duty upon the goods and merchandise coming from another State over their borders. The questions that are being discussed to-day, the principles that are being invoked to-day, never glinted in the discussion of that question for a moment.

But as Chief Justice Marshall has said, it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that it should be sufficiently elastic and expanding and growing to meet the changing conditions of a growing civilization. That is true. I think the man would be narrow, indeed, who in this age would undertake to oppose the application of a principle of deduction from the provisions of the Constitution simply because the like conditions did not exist at that time.

Mr. President, we can not deprive the court having jurisdiction of the constitutional rights of a party from staying the hand that attempts to take them from the party. We can not by legislation or by failing to enact any law say that the court, vested by the Constitution with the interpretation and the application of the law of the country, shall not prevent the provisions of the Constitution from being violated so far as it prohibits the taking of private property from the individual. We may pass a law and place it upon the statute books, saying that the court shall not restrain the destruction of a man's rights under the Constitution, and the court will say that our act was void. The court will say, "We are the guardians of the constitutional rights of the parties, and whenever they invoke our aid for their enforcement we invest them with that power."

Congress may enact laws, but it must enact them within the limitations of the Constitution, and when Congress forgets or fails to perform that duty the court will say, "Your enactment is void." The court will say to Congress, "Certain rights are invested or certain powers are given the courts by the Constitution; you can not and may not take them from the court. You can not prevent us by any law that you may enact from exercising jurisdiction over the subjects that are intrusted to our jurisdiction by the Constitution. They are enumerated. This right is within that class."

Now, I think it is usually admitted—and it was admitted by Senators who are in favor of the pending bill—that these constitutional rights are probably sufficient of themselves. I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] assented to the proposition, if he did not confess it, that in the absence of any legislation the right of review exists and that we might rest upon that and be content with it.

The question is, Shall we do it? The question is, Shall we rest upon the constitutional right of inquiry and control over this question or shall we at the demand of the people be more specific and formulate and even at the expense of reasserting the constitutional questions express a method for the enforcement of this law? Now, that is the question.

Mr. President, even though it be conceded that the constitutional provisions are in themselves sufficient to enable the courts to protect the individual rights of property, I see no reason why Congress may not on this occasion, under the circumstances surrounding the consideration of this question, reincorporate in the proposed law the principles of the Constitution as they are found within that document and as they are expressed in the decisions of the courts of this law. That will relieve the people of any uncertainty or doubt as to the intention of Congress. It will probably save the necessity of going to the Supreme Court for the purpose of learning that which we can just as well tell them in the text of this statute.

With me it is more a question of expediency in legislation than anything else. Believing, as I do, that the constitutional power of the courts to review the acts of the administrative body is already sufficient and would meet every emergency, I am willing, I am more than willing, in the abundance of caution, if I may apply that term, upon the appeal of the people for a definite statement of their rights, to relieve them from the necessity of inquiring again of the courts as to what they are. I am willing and I believe that it is the part of wisdom on the part of Congress to clearly express the right of review, and then, having done that, to prescribe such limitations as will insure against delay, and as will insure against a miscarriage of justice by reason of the length of time which must elapse for the consideration of such a question by the courts.

I do not think it proper or appropriate to provide for an appeal from an executive or administrative body to a court. I do not tnink it appropriate to provide a remedy through the medium of an appeal. It must be provided through the medium of that other class of writs, more mandatory in character, more prompt in their action—the writ of mandamus, or the writ of injunction, or the writ of review.

Now, those writs came into use for the purpose of expediting matters originally. That was their purpose. The writ of injunction is intended to stay the hand of the spoiler until the law can act with more deliberation. The writ of mandate was intended to command an executive officer, or an officer subject to such a writ, to do something without waiting to determine whether or not it ought to be done as a matter of last consideration. The writ of review was to avoid the necessity and inconvenience of the delay incident to an appeal.

So I say the right of appeal here is not necessary and it is not an appropriate remedy. But we should give by express provisions in this bill the right to consider the action of the board of commissioners through the medium of a writ of a mandate, a mandamus rather, or a writ of injunction, or a writ of review.

Then the next consideration is how prompt shall that be. I would be in favor of limiting it to the shortest practicable time for the preparation and consideration of that kind of a question. When we have done that we will have met the requirements of the people of this country.

I do not know, Mr. President, whether the people are going to derive as much profit and satisfaction and happiness from the enactment of this legislation as they think they are. I am afraid they are going to be disappointed. But we are here as the representatives of the people. We owe them a certain measure of concession, even though we may be sure that we are right. When not violating our principles or doing violence to our judgment, it is appropriate as their representatives that we should give heed to their cry for relief.

It is conceded that to a certain extent a condition of evil exists; that to a certain extent the people's rights are being infringed by these agencies that were created by the law for the purpose of serving the people.

Now, it only follows that we shall, as I said, without doing violence to our conscience or our duty, within those limitations, grant them the greatest measure of relief. Let the bill provide that, upon the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that board, in the name of the United States, at the expense of the United States, shall represent the injured party, and that they may do it by an appropriate remedy—by injunction, if injunction is necessary, to stay the hand of the spoiler; by a writ of mandamus, if the parties are obdurate and refuse to act, or by a writ of review, if it is merely a question of bringing it up, as by certiorari—but let the bill provide that this remedy shall be, as I said, exercised by the officers of the United States in the appropriate jurisdiction; and I would provide that those steps should be taken and consummated with thirty days from the rendition of the decision.

The only difference between that and existing conditions is that it would be done at the expense of the United States and in the name of the United States, and that the Government would be a party to the litigation. It would come within that provision I have just read—section 2 of Article III of the Constitution. Suits wherein the Government is a party have a status peculiar to themselves in the courts. They have rights, so far as convenience and procedure are concerned, that are valuable to them and tend to expedite the hearing.

Let this statute, when it is enacted, provide that these suits, brought in the name of the Government of the Unied States and at its expense, for the benefit not only of the party whose interests were particularly before the board, but of all persons belonging to that class, shall be brought into the court by this speedy procedure and a rule established, and after the rule is established as to a certain class of shippers or a certain class of merchandise or a certain condition or set of conditions, the law can be enforced by writ of mandate, because the principle will be established and the court will hold it res adjudicata, as having been passed upon.

There is a great evil which has been permitted by Congress that has grown up. I had not intended to discuss it at this time, but I want to refer to it as a part of my remarks. I have taken some pains to gather some data in regard to it that ought to be of interest to any legislative body considering this question. I telegraphed for it and received it only since last Saturday. I have it here.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has not been a benefit to the people of this country. It has not been a benefit to the consumers of this country. It may have been a convenience to the shippers; it may have been at times a convenience to the transportation companies; but it has not been of any benefit to the consumers, and they constitute about 90 per cent of all the people. It has resulted in converting the seaboard towns in this country into tollgates. It has resulted in accumulating around the margin or border of this country an undue proportion or share of the wealth of the country by its discrimination under the long and short haul clause; by that ruling which enabled the transportation companies to charge the people in the State which I represent on this floor the rate to the Pacific coast plus the local rate back—700 or 800 or even a thousand miles—to some of our shipping points. Under the plea that this discrimination was necessary because of the enforced competition between water and rail navigation the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its varying personality, has construed the laws of Congress as they were never intended to be construed; the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts having an imperfect understanding of the question. Congress undertook to cure existing evils, and instead of curing them—the existing evils, resting upon the then decision of the courts—they emphasized them. They gave them not only the prestige of the courts' decision before the enactment of the law, but they gave them the prestige of the interpretation which the courts placed upon the enactment of Congress.

Let me call your attention to what they are doing under the guise of avoiding the evils of competition between water and rail. I could have obtained this information perhaps here in Washington. I wanted it from the ground.

Take hardware. In a country like ours that is a very large item. It amounts to a vast traffic in our country. Sometimes in the equipment of a single mill it will amount to a quarter of a million dollars; there will be train loads of this material. From Cincinnati and common points to our central point of shipment the rate is $1.25 per hundred, and to the Pacific coast 80 cents. Where is the water competition between Cincinnati and coast points?

Take canned goods—an article of consumption to a very large extent. From Chicago to our points of shipment the rate is $1.35; to the coast 95 cents. I am merely calling attention to this matter that we may see how the present legislation has operated in the interpretation that has been placed upon it.

Take dry goods. From Chicago to Spokane the rate is $3.60 per hundred, while from Chicago to the coast it is $3 per hundred; on agricultural implements from Chicago to Spokane the rate is $1.65, while from Chicago to the coast it is $1.35.

Now take Boise. While the rate on first-class freight from Chicago to Portland is $3, the rate from Chicago to Boise is $3.30 per hundred. There is not even railroad competition there, for there is only one transcontinental railroad.

Mr. DOLLIVER. How do they explain that?

Mr. HEYBURN. They do not explain it. They simply say, "We have the power."

Now, while we are regulating freight rates, let us see to it that we legislate wide enough and broad enough to prevent that. This difference in freight amounts to millions of dollars to our people every year. You take the difference of 80 cents a hundred in rates on standard articles, in which the shipments are so large, and figure that up on a carload——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Would the fact that these goods that go out there would go to New York or to the coast have anything to do with the fixing of the rate from Chicago to the coast? Might not that arise out of the competition between New York and Chicago?

Mr. HEYBURN. But how is there any competition between New York and Chicago with Boise, Idaho?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I refer to the rate to the coast.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know that the rate to the coast would, of course, be based upon the rate to New York by water transportation.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What I want to get at is, is there any reason in basing the rate from Chicago to the coast upon the rate from New York to the coast? For example, if it costs more for dry goods from Chicago to the coast than it does to New York, would not that operate to transfer Chicago's business to New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is one of the reasons they give; but there is absolutely no foundation for it, because that presupposes that these goods could and would go by water from New York, by the way of Panama or by the way of Cape Horn, to the Pacific coast. But you take the class of goods here that can not possibly be shipped that way, and you would have to ship them from New York, plus the freight from Chicago to New York, in order to compete with the other rate to Seattle or Portland or any other coast point.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would say to the Senator that I have often been struck with those rates as entirely wanting in what appeared to me to be equity and fairness toward those interior points; but I find that most of them have been justified by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I think that many of them, the most extreme cases, have been justified by the courts. What I wanted to get at was what explanation was given to the people in the intermountain country regarding this?

Mr. HEYBURN. They have not deigned to give any explanation, except such as the people of that intermountain country get through the newspapers and through the discussion of these questions in Congress and elsewhere. We are inquiring why it is in that country, and have been for a long time, and we should like to have an answer.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, referring to the pending bill, I would say that it is entirely adequate to protect Boise, Idaho, upon the showing that the rate from Chicago to Boise is exorbitant. The power under this bill is expressly confided to the Commission to reduce that rate to a reasonable maximum.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I want to be sure that this bill is going to afford an adequate remedy. That is the reason I have injected this question at this time. I want to be quite sure that that Commission is equipped by the provisions of this bill to remedy these evils, evils which enable the carriers to haul oil from Chicago to Portland for 90 cents, and from Chicago to Boise, 515 miles this side of Portland, for $1.53½. We want the Commission to be clothed with power, and we want them to be blessed with the disposition to grant relief against that condition.

Those are only instances. I have here complete schedules of freights I have received from out there of comparative rates. Why is it, and where is the competition that justifies them in charging us a higher rate per hundred from Boise to Chicago, than they do from Portland to Chicago? Chicago is not a seaport town; Chicago does not present the proposition of competition between water transportation and railroads, nor even that between competing railroads, because there is only one railroad to Boise, and there is not another competing railroad within about 500 miles of Boise, and yet they do it.

I want to be quite sure that when we have enacted this law it will be sufficient to meet the necessities of the people. We want the provision as to review to possess the elements of promptness and certainty, and that it shall be limited within a period that the courts usually consider sufficient in which to deal with these questions, such as injunctions, mandamuses, and that class of relief. I want the bill to express it. Notwithstanding the fact that I believe, as was said in the decision I started to read during my interruption of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that the Constitution itself is broad enough, yet inasmuch as it would necessitate that the people should go to the court to have that right again defined and limited and applied, let the statute say so. It can do no harm. We have reenacted the Constitution of the United States in the Revised Statutes over and over again, perhaps fifty times; and there was never at all any delicacy about doing it. It does not hurt the Constitution, and it certainly is a balm of relief to the minds of the people.

The people are demanding it. I do not say that because of the frenzy of the country upon this question. I have not been much influenced by that; but I believe the people are entitled to have their representatives sometimes give heed to their homely wisdom, which represents the composite knowledge and intelligence of the entire country.

Just what provision will best do that is something to be yet determined in this body; but I hope to see those in charge of of this bill that has been reported by the committee, known as the "Hepburn-Dolliver bill," agree to the incorporation in the bill of a provision that will meet the suggestions that I have made of a quick, prompt, and efficient review, that shall not be by appeal, but which shall be through the medium of those quicker processes known to the courts for the enforcement of the orders of a board.

As I have said before, an appeal is no appropriate remedy for reviewing the order of an executive or a legislative tribunal, because an appeal implies the going up from one judicial tribunal to another. But let us review their action, inasmuch as we are going to have legislation upon this subject, by the most speedy method that will respect in the fullest measure the constitutional rights of the transportation companies and of the people.

I say again a word of warning. The people are going to be very much disappointed in the result of this legislation. But that is not new. That condition has often presented itself to the people of this country. The people—and when I say "the people" I mean the consumers of this country—are going to be much disappointed over the result of this legislation. Why do I say that? In the neighboring State of Washington—we live only 125 miles from that State—for years the political parties of that State have been disrupted over the question of a railroad commission; it has divided conventions; it has broken up political affiliations; there have been many heartburnings and dissensions and charges of corruption and rapacity.

In the last campaign the issue was fought out and the people secured the election of a legislature favorable to the creation of a railroad commission that should have just such powers as this bill is going to confer upon the Government railway commission. It was said during the campaign that the people were in agony because of the injustice, the discrimination, and the oppression under which they were living. They were told that these rates were exorbitant, and such rates were pointed out with circumstantial particularity during the campaign, and it was explained how the rates between these points and other points should be adjusted. You would have supposed that as soon as the commission was installed in office the people would be found standing in line at its doors asking for a redress of their complaints and wrongs, and yet that commission met at the city of Spokane, the very hotbed of this agitation, remained in session eight days, and there was not a single complaint presented to them. Their presence there was advertised in the papers; the commission went to the leading merchants and shippers and said, "We are here to do what we can to redress your wrongs," but there was not in eight days a single complaint made to the commission, and they adjourned and went away.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please inform us what that commission was?

Mr. HEYBURN. The railroad commission of the State of Washington.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh!

Mr. HEYBURN. An ex-Senator from the State of Washington is here. I saw him in the Chamber a little while ago, and I think he will confirm the statement I have just made.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not doubt it at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have talked with that gentleman about it. It was a source of astonishment only to those people who had been carried away by the enthusiasm of agitators. That was all. The people were led to believe that they were suffering from great wrongs, until they felt all the pain and agony that would have accompanied the existence of such wrongs; each man thought that his neighbor was sick, and when you came to sift it down and the doctor was in the household ready to apply the remedy there was nobody sick, and he went home.

I do not mean to say that there are not many questions to be settled and determined by a commission such as that or such as the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not mean to say that there is not a field of usefulness within which such a commission may act, but I do mean to say that we do not want to be carried away by any false wave of enthusiasm in legislating upon this question. We do not want to believe or allow ourselves to believe that the people are suffering in the death throes of their prosperity for this class of legislation and have our minds agitated and act as though there was reason for precipitate haste in doing this.

Let us consider it well. First, establish the primary object to be attained, then determine on the best method of attaining it. That is the orderly way to proceed. Let us give the people legislation upon this subject; let us prescribe the character of review that shall be given to the action of that board, and then let us see to it that, so far as it lies within our power, that board shall be composed of men who are capable and competent to deal with this question.

I do not know that I shall have anything further to say during this discussion; but I did feel impelled to-day, because of the discussion of the intricate legal problems that are wrapped around and around this main consideration until the spirit of it is hid and smothered within words and theories—I felt impelled to unwrap it from those bandages, and, if I could, do something toward laying bare the real issue, the real question that we have got to decide.

Mr. President, the power is beyond doubt. It is merely a question of how we shall exercise it.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] does not desire to go on with the pending bill any further to-day, and as I understand the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] does not want to go on with the fortifications appropriation bill, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is perfectly agreeable to me. I wish to conform to the wishes of Senators who desire to speak, and as nobody else has signified an intention to speak to-day, I shall not object to the Senator's proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from New Jersey withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the only opportunity we have in this body to legislate for the District of Columbia is on occasions such as this. In the other House they have one day in each week for the consideration of District business, but here we have no set time. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 1413, being Senate bill 4426.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, so that it will retain its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INSANE CRIMINALS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4426) to amend section 927 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to insane criminals.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 927 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended by the acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 927. Insane criminals.—When any person tried upon an indictment or information for an offense is acquitted on the sole ground that he was insane at the time of its commission, that fact shall be set forth by the jury in their verdict; and whenever a person in indicted or is charged by an information for an offense, and before trial or after a verdict of guilty, prima facie evidence is submitted to the court that the accused is then insane, the court may cause a jury to be impaneled from the jurors then in attendance on the court or, if the regular jurors have been discharged, may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be drawn to inquire into the insanity of the accused, and said inquiry shall be conducted in the presence and under the direction of the court. If the jury shall find the accused to be then insane, or if an accused person shall be acquitted by the jury solely on the ground of insanity, the court may certify the fact to the Secretary of the Interior, who may order such person to be confined in the hospital for the insane, and said person and his estate shall be charged with the expense of his support in the said hospital. The person whose sanity is in question shall be entitled to his bill of exceptions and an appeal as in other cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4236) to establish a fish-cultural station at Neligh, Nebr.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "at," to strike out "Neligh, Antelope County, Nebr.," and insert "a point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Nebraska, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, said station to be located at a point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Nebraska."

ARTHUR A. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4350) for the relief of Arthur A. Underwood.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $277.48 to pay Arthur A. Underwood, for expenses incurred en route to and from the national rifle competition, which was held at Sea Girt, N. J., August 24 to September 9, 1905, and while in attendance there.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuseday, March 20, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 19, 1906.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Charles S. Francis, of New York, to be ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States to Austria-Hungary, vice Bellamy Storer, recalled.

INDIAN INSPECTOR.

Walter B. Hill, of Concord, N. H., to be an Indian inspector (irrigation engineer), vice Charles F. Nesler, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 19, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. A. B. CHURCH, president of Buchtel College, Akron, Ohio.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER. There comes up from Friday, as unfinished business, the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15744) to abolish the office of Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 5 of the amendment, after the word "when," by inserting the words "after October 12, 1906."

The SPEAKER. Upon this amendment the House was dividing; the yeas and nays had been ordered upon the amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk has by unanimous consent reported. Those in favor of the amendment to the amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answered "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, there is so much confusion we did not hear what the question is; and I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 103, answered "present" 20, not voting 122, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to sell or otherwise dispose of any or all of the timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation in New Mexico, whether allotted or unallotted; if allotted, with the consent of the allottee, the proceeds to be used by the Secretary of the Interior in the purchase of stock for the benefit of all of said Indians, or for such other purpose as in his judgment will tend to promote their welfare and advance them in civilization.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 8 strike out the word "used" and insert instead thereof the words "deposited in the United States Treasury to be expended."

In line 9 strike out the words "in the purchase of stock" after the word "Interior" and strike out the words "of all" after the word "benefit."

In line 10 strike out the words "or for such other purpose" and insert instead thereof the words "in such manner," and as so amended the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOGG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States, and amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there a substitute or amendments?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass the following Senate bill, with amendments, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consular system of the United States be reorganized in the manner hereinafter provided in this act.

SEC. 2. That the consuls-general and the consuls of the United States shall hereafter be classified and graded as hereinafter specified, with the salaries of each class herein affixed thereto.

Class 7, $2,500.—Acapulco, Aden, Algiers, Alexandretta, Bamberg, Batum, Belize, Bergen, Breslau, Brunswick, Cardiff, Chihuahua, Ciudad Juarez, Ciudad Porfirio Diaz, Collinwood, Cork, Crefeld, Curaçao, Eibenstock, Gothenburg, Hamilton (Bermuda), Harput, Hull, Jerez de la Frontera, La Rochelle, Leeds, Madrid, Magdeburg, Malta, Maracaibo, Martinique, Matamoros, Mazatlan, Milan, Moscow, Nice, Nogales, Nuevo Laredo, Orillia, Plymouth, Port Hope, Port Limon, Prescott, Puerto Cortez, Rheims, Rosario, Roubaix, St. Johns (Newfoundland), St. Etienne, Sarnia, Sault Ste. Marie, Seville, Stettin, Tamatave, Tegucigalpa, Teneriffe, Trebizond, Valencia, Weimar, Windsor (Ontario), Yarmouth, Zanzibar, Zittau.

Class 8, $2,000.—Aguascalientes, Antigua, Asuncion, Bagdad, Belleville, Belgrade, Bristol, Campbellton, Cape Gracias, Cape Haitien, Cartagena, Castellamare di Stabia, Catania, Ceiba, Charlottetown, Coaticook, Cornwall, Durango, Ensenada, Fort Erie, Funchal, Gaspe, Gibraltar, Glauchau, Goree-Dakar, Grenoble, Guadeloupe, Hermosillo, Hobart, Iquique, Jalapa, Jamestown, Kingston (Ontario), La Paz, Limoges, Manzanillo, Maskat, Messina, Moncton, Niagara Falls, Patras, Port Louis, Port Rowan, Port Stanley, Progreso, Puerto Cabello, Puerto Plata, Riga, Rouen, Saigon, St. Christopher, St. Hyacinthe, St. Johns (Quebec), St. Pierre, St. Stephen, Saltillo, Sierra Leone, Sivas, Stavanger, Suva, Tahiti, Turin, Turks Island, Tuxpam, Utilla, Venice, Warsaw, Windsor (Nova Scotia), Woodstock.

SEC. 3. That the offices of vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls shall be filled by appointment, as heretofore, except that whenever, in his judgment, the good of the service requires it, consuls may be designated by the President without thereby changing their classification to act for a period not to exceed six months as vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls; and when so acting they shall not be deemed to have vacated their offices as consuls. Consular agents may be appointed, when necessary, as heretofore. The grade of commercial agent is abolished.

SEC. 4. That there shall be five inspectors of consulates, to be designated and commissioned as consuls-general at large, who shall receive an annual salary of $5,000 each, and shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State. They shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the members of the consular force possessing the requisite qualifications of experience and ability. They shall make such inspections of consular offices as the Secretary of State shall direct, and shall report to him. Each consular office shall be inspected at least once in every two years. Whenever the President has reason to believe that the business of a consulate or a consulate-general is not being properly conducted and that it is necessary for the public interest, he may authorize any consul-general at large to suspend the consul or consul-general and administer the office in his stead for a period not exceeding ninety days. In such case the consul-general at large so authorized shall have power to suspend any vice or deputy consular officer or clerk in said office during the period aforesaid. The provisions of law relating to the official bonds of consuls-general, and the provisions of sections 1734, 1735, and 1736, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall apply to consuls-general at large.

SEC. 5. No person who is not an American citizen shall be appointed hereafter in any consulate-general or consulate to any clerical position the salary of which is $1,000 a year or more.

SEC. 6. Sections 1699 and 1700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1699. No consul-general, consul, or consular agent receiving a salary of more than $1,000 a year shall, while he holds his office, be interested in or transact any business as a merchant, factor, broker, or other trader, or as a clerk or other agent for any such person to, from, or within the port, place, or limits of his jurisdiction, directly or indirectly, either in his own name or in the name or through the agency of any other person; nor shall he practice as a lawyer for compensation or be interested in the fees or compensation of any lawyer; and he shall in his official bond stipulate as a condition thereof not to violate this prohibition.

"SEC. 1700. All consular officers whose respective salaries exceed $1,000 a year shall be subject to the prohibition against transacting business, practicing as a lawyer, or being interested in the fees or compensation of any lawyer contained in the preceding section. And the President may extend the prohibition to any consul-general, consul, or consular agent whose salary does not exceed $1,000 a year or who may be compensated by fees, and to any vice or deputy consular officer or consular agent, and may require such officer to give a bond not to violate the prohibition."

SEC. 7. That every consular officer of the United States is hereby required, whenever application is made to him therefor, within the limits of his consulate, to administer to or take from any person any oath, affirmation, affidavit, or deposition, and to perform any other notarial act which any notary public is required or authorized by law to do within the United States; and for every such notarial act performed he shall charge in each instance the appropriate fee prescribed by the President under section 1745, Revised Statutes.

SEC. 8. That all fees, official or unofficial, received by any officer in the consular service for services rendered in connection with the duties of his office or as a consular officer, including fees for notarial services, and fees for taking depositions, executing commissions or letters rogatory, settling estates, receiving or paying out moneys, caring for or disposing of property, shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the sole and only compensation of such officers shall be by salaries fixed by law; but this shall not apply to consular agents, who shall be paid by one half of the fees received in their offices, up to a maximum sum of $1,000 in any one year, the other half being accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States. And vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls, in addition to such compensation as they may be entitled to receive as consuls or clerks, may receive such portion of the salaries of the consul-general or consuls for whom they act as shall be provided by regulation.

SEC. 9. That fees for the consular certification of invoices shall be, and they hereby are, included with the fees for official services for which the President is authorized by section 1745 of the Revised Statutes to prescribe rates or tariffs; and sections 2851 and 1721 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

SEC. 10. That every consular officer shall be provided and kept supplied with adhesive official stamps, on which shall be printed the equivalent money value of denominations and to amounts to be determined by the Department of State, and shall account quarterly to the Department of State for the use of such stamps and for such of them as shall remain in his hands.

Whenever a consular officer is required or finds it necessary to perform any consular or notarial act he shall prepare and deliver to the party or parties at whose instance such act is performed a suitable and appropriate document as prescribed in the consular regulations and affix thereto and duly cancel an adhesive stamp or stamps of the denomination or denominations equivalent to the fee prescribed for such consular or notarial act, and no such act shall be legally valid within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States unless such stamp or stamps is or are affixed and canceled.

SEC. 11. That this act shall take effect on the 30th day of June, 1906.

SEC. 12. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct a clerical error. On page 2, line 12, strike out the word "Teheran."

Mr. MANN. What becomes, then, of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania modifies his motion to suspend the rules, the bill having been read, by striking out the word "Teheran."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it necessary to demand a second?

The SPEAKER. A second is necessary.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that a second be dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Has a second been demanded, Mr. Speaker? I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned for expressing a little personal pleasure and satisfaction, that after sixteen years of labor in and out of this honorable House, I have this morning the first opportunity to submit for its consideration on the floor, the consular reorganization bill, a measure which, in the opinion of those who have looked into it most carefully, is one of great importance to the country at large, and will do much for the building up of our foreign commerce.

The fact that for the first hundred years of its existence our country was engaged in developing its internal resources for the supply of the home markets is the explanation of the apparent lack of interest on the part of Congress and of the country at large to this important business branch of our Government service, whose purpose was to develop our commerce abroad.

The service was instituted by the acts of July 1, 1790, and April 14, 1792. Even at its inception Washington called attention to its purpose and importance. A half century elapsed before Congress showed any further interest in our consular service, when the act of 1856 was passed, which slightly enlarged the service and corrected certain abuses therein by closer supervision of the fees. The shipping statute of 1883 swept away the whole schedule of fees for services to American vessels, which up to that time had been a lucrative emolument to the consuls, but little or nothing has since been given to them in compensation for their loss with any view to the universality of its application.

The continual shifting of the lines of our commercial activity makes great changes in the relative importance of our consulates at different points. This creates a strong demand for the rearrangement of both the grade and the compensation of the various consulates. The great inequalities of the compensation to the consuls at the different posts is another evil that for many years has been demanding a remedy.

A careful supervision of the various consulates, either by the consulates-general or by a corps of inspectors, has been a long-felt want, and the existence of nonofficial fees, the rates of which have been left largely to the discretion of the consuls, has proved an evil from which our citizens abroad have greatly suffered and made much complaint.

This bill far from fulfills the desires of those who have worked long and earnestly for the reorganization of our consular service, but it embodies four points of great importance in that direction—the classification of the consulates-general and consulates, the turning of all fees into the United States Treasury, the provision that all consuls receiving a salary of a thousand dollars or more must be American citizens, and the establishment of a corps of inspectors to see that the incumbents properly perform their duties.

The advantage of a reorganization of our consular service has been called to the attention of Congress from time to time by those who saw the growing necessity for some legislation in that regard. The Department of State has long recognized the inadequacy of the consular service to the growing needs of the country and to the proper protection of the business and property of our citizens residing abroad, either for business or the pleasure of travel.

Secretary of State Livingston, in 1833, and Secretary of State Buchanan, in 1846, called attention to the evils existing in the service, but it was not until 1884, when Secretary of State Frelinghuysen discussed the subject in his admirable and exhaustive report, transmitted to Congress by President Arthur March 20 of that year, that the strong necessity for action was made apparent. In it he said:

> Until recently the demands of Europe, which consumed the greater portion of our exports, and the condition of the producing countries were such as to give us control in the supply of certain products, such as breadstuffs, provisions, cotton, and petroleum, etc. The demands of Europe for all these products and of the other continents for petroleum especially were so positive, and our producing condition so favorable, as to give us practically a monopoly for their supply.
> These conditions of international demand and supply are undergoing radical changes, which the near future will intensify.
> The efforts which have been made and which are being made by Europe to enlarge the field of supply in the above-mentioned products, aided by the ambition which prevails in all countries for the development of natural and artificial resources to meet their own wants and to supply the wants of others, have resulted in awakening competition for the supply even of those products which we have heretofore controlled. It is true that thus far this competition has not affected our trade to any appreciable extent, but the desire for development which is now abroad and the ambition which prevails to increase the production (outside of the United States) of the foregoing articles render consular supervision of absolute importance. The complex commercial relations and industrial interests which now prevail in Europe have originated hostility to American products in many countries and afford additional reasons for the enlargement and perfection of the consular service.

Assistant Secretary Rockhill, in an article in the Forum for the month of February, 1897, sums up the evils of our consular system as follows:

> (1) Imperfect mode of selection of consular officers.
> (2) No permanency of tenure.
> (3) Inadequate compensation, resulting in (a) the exaction of excessive fees and (b) the creation of consular agencies to increase salaries.
> (4) Excessive number of fee consulates and commercial agencies.
> (5) Imperfect enforcement of regulations, especially as regards amounts of fees and their collection.

This judgment from a late Assistant Secretary of State, who had especial charge of the consular service, is certainly deserving of great weight upon this subject.

This bill proposes that all grades of consuls shall be citizens of the United States and shall be placed under a salary; does away with consular or commercial agencies, and provides that all fees of all kinds must be accounted for and covered into the United States Treasury. Of the advantages of this system over the present one abundant evidence is presented by those most conversant with the needs of the service. In 1871 Inspector Keim reported:

> The act of 1856 was doubtless designed to correct the most conspicuous abuses which prevailed. * * * The evils prior to that date may have been mitigated or may have suffered temporary abatement. * * * They were certainly not eradicated; and these abuses * * * have been perpetuated in most cases by each succeeding officer.

Again, in 1879, Gen. Julius Stahel, then consul at Hiogo, Japan, wrote to the Department of State:

> The permission granted to consular officers of receiving unofficial fees for notarial acts, etc., is liable to abuse, and is the root of many evils and irregularities. * * * I suggest that the permission to charge unofficial fees be withdrawn, and that all fees received by consular officers, for whatsoever service rendered, be considered as official, and so accounted for. * * * In this way one of the greatest evils of our service would be remedied and dignity added to the representation of the United States in foreign countries.

Secretary Frelinghuysen, in his report of 1884 on the consular service, said:

> In the opinion of the Department the present system of compensation by fees, either official or unofficial, should be abolished. Whatever money comes into the consul's hands should be turned into the Treasury of the United States, and he should depend for his support entirely upon the salary allowed by Congress.

In 1885, writing on the same subject to the Department, Gen. John S. Mosby, consul at Hongkong, expressed himself even more emphatically:

> Consular fees should, in my opinion, be altogether abolished. * * * The best way to secure honesty in the public service is to make it impossible for officers to be dishonest. I can see no sound reason for sending consuls abroad to collect revenue for the Government. You might as well send the Navy to do it.

The Hon. Robert Adams, jr., when United States minister to Brazil in 1889, wrote in the North American Review:

> The method by which the men are chosen for the positions necessarily brings forth poor candidates, while the short tenure of office, which is generally limited to the Presidential term, almost certainly so if a change of party takes place, and the meager salaries paid—in some posts hardly sufficient to support life in a respectable manner—deters competent men from entering the service. It should also be remembered that there is no promotion for efficient service; that a consul can not hope for a change of climate from a trying to a more healthful and genial one after a given period of service, and that there is always the prospect of returning to the United States broken down in health, unfitted to resume private business, and without prospect of further employment at the hands of the Government.

His excellency the Chinese minister, in a recent address before the University of Pennsylvania, says:

> Most European governments send young men to the East to learn the language and study the customs of the country. After a residence of two or three years, when they have proved themselves proficient, after passing a strict examination, they are then placed in responsible positions as student interpreters, consular assistants, etc. Merit is awarded by promotion. Thus those governments have competent men specially fitted for service in the Orient. It might not be unwise for your Government to adopt a sizilar system.

President McKinley, in his message to Congress in 1902, impressed upon it the necessity of legislation on this subject. He said:

> The consular service is now organized under the provisions of a law passed in 1856, which is entirely inadequate to existing conditions. The interest shown by so many commercial bodies throughout the country in the reorganization of the service is heartily commended to your attention. Several bills providing for a new consular service have in recent years been submitted to Congress. They are based upon the just principle that appointments to the service should be made only after a practical test of the applicant's fitness, that promotion should be governed by trustworthiness, adaptability, and zeal in the performance of duty, and that the tenure of office should be unaffected by partisan considerations.
> The guardianship and fostering of our rapidly expanding foreign commerce, the protection of American citizens resorting to foreign countries in lawful pursuit of their affairs, and the maintenance of the dignity of the nation abroad combine to make it essential that our consuls should be men of character, knowledge, and enterprise. It is true that the service is now, in the main, efficient, but a standard of excellence can not be permanently maintained until the principles set forth in the bills heretofore submitted to the Congress on this subject are enacted into law.

This bill will accomplish three great points. Those who have had long legislative experience—I have had twenty-three years—know that all proposed legislation ends in compromise, and have had it beaten into them that a half loaf is better than no bread.

The first great point accomplished is the classification of the consular service. The inequalities heretofore have been very great. This classification is based largely on the present salaries of consuls—not the most perfect method, I will admit—but here is where practical utility comes in. If you attempt to reduce the salaries of any of the present incumbents you at once fortify the opposition with a sufficient number of votes to defeat the bill in the House of Representatives.

To illustrate: The State Department thought it would be a good idea to reduce the number of consuls-general. The term "consul-general" in our service is an anomaly. My own idea on that question would be to take a certain area of consulates, and somewhere in the center of that area have a consul-general. Then give him the power to inspect the neighboring consulates and hold him responsible, as you do in business, government. or other administration; but such a storm was raised on the question whether a man should eliminate from his visiting card the title "consul-general"—that was all it amounted to—that I assure you the seven consuls-general that were affected thereby could almost have succeeded in defeating the bill. In some instances, I am free to say, there was some reason against their reduction, as at Munich and Dresden, where there are minor German courts, and where we have no diplomatic representatives. There seemed to be some justification that at such points the consul should have the higher title for whatever functions had to be performed by him.

The next great improvement in the service is the equalization of salaries. I do not know whether all of you know it, but the fact is that the consul-general in London gets much more compensation than our ambassador "near the Court of St. James." So, also, at Paris. The compensation at those places will be reduced by this bill. The consuls are given $12,000 a year, a very great cut, which I must say will bear hardly upon our present incumbents, for they naturally had a right to expect that during their terms of office they should receive the same compensation as they received at the time they entered the service.

On the other hand, when you find men in tropical countries, who have to take their lives in their hands in order to represent their Government and perform their duties; when you find that such men were receiving mere pittances, disgraceful to our country, we may be somewhat reconciled in our personal feelings for those whose salaries have been reduced.

The next great evil that is cured by this bill is that all fees, official and unofficial, must be turned into the Treasury of the United States. One of the greatest causes of complaint by our merchants abroad and by the traveling public has been the impositions that have been placed upon them by our consuls for nonofficial fees. These nonofficial fees were not mentioned in the schedule of the Department, and so the consuls could charge pretty much what they chose. In addition to that, consuls were allowed to practice law and perform other duties, such as taking charge of estates, and for those services they charged fees fixed by themselves, and therefore properly founded complaints came in to the Department. This will be entirely done away with. All fees, official and unofficial, must be turned into the Treasury of the United States. In lieu therefor we propose to raise the salaries of those consuls to be somewhere near what they have been getting.

The third good provision in this bill, that no person who is not an American citizen shall be appointed hereafter in any consulate or consulate-general to any clerical position the salary of which is $1,000 or more a year, will remedy an evil which has been much complained of by our merchants and business men generally. The fact that foreigners were employed in positions where they could gain a knowledge of our business relations with foreign countries which could be useful to their governments or their merchants to the detriment of our own was a very serious matter. It also tended to the giving of information to one firm to the prejudice of a competitor, thereby creating unfair conditions instead of equality for all. Besides this we have a plenty of our own citizens both capable and patriotic enough to serve their country in these minor positions abroad.

A fourth point, which the Secretary of State considers of equal if not greater importance, is the creation of five inspectors. These are to be placed, one in Asia, one in Africa, one in Europe, one in America, and one in Australia. Up to this time there has been no provision in our service for the inspection of consulates. The function of inspection hitherto has not attached to consuls-general. Individuals have been sent out from the State Department. The Secretary two years ago sent out a representative, who made a very efficient inspection, the result of which was that several consuls were dismissed from the service. These inspectors, living near the scene of complaint, will be easily reached, will be on the ground to make the inspection. And, aside from actual complaints made, their duty would be every two years to visit the consulates in rotation, to inspect the offices, look at the books and accounts, and see that everything is in proper order. This, in my judgment, will be a very great addition to the efficiency of the service, for, as the Secretary said before our committee, even the best men, in the lassitude of tropical climates, removed from home and American influence, and especially being kept there a great many years, will sometimes fall from grace, so to speak, and acquire lazy habits, immoral habits, if you will, that are very disgraceful in men acting as representatives of our country. Of course this is a matter that can not be cured absolutely and entirely, but biennial inspections will certainly serve to discover the habits of men in their daily lives, and the inspectors can secure information from people in the neighborhood and those doing business at the consulate. This will certainly tend, like the inspection of the Army and the Navy, to keep up discipline.

I wish further to assure the House most emphatically and beyond dispute, that there is no civil service embodied in this bill as it now stands, nor is there any tenure of office. Those are two leading objections which the Members of this House have heretofore advanced in opposition to this bill. As I have said, there are four good purposes to be accomplished by this legislation: First, consuls are classified and put on a closer equality in regard to compensation; second, all the fees are to be turned into the Treasury of the United States and accounted for, both official and unofficial; third, every appointment in the consular service with a salary of more than $1,000 must be an American citizen, which up to this time has not been the law, and, fourth, there are to be five inspectors, whose duty it shall be to inspect the various consulships that exist in the service.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have not the time to answer now. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY] will answer all questions. Now, in the opinion of the State Department and those familiar with the service, this provision is one of the most important features of the bill. While the personnel of our service is good, still there are times when men sent into a foreign country, removed from their influences of home, become careless in their habits, careless in their work, and it is therefore necessary to have this inspection. Heretofore where consulships have been inspected they have been found, some of them, derelict, and therefore this is urged strongly for the consideration of the House.

These are the salient features that are to be accomplished by this bill, and, the time being so short, I will not undertake to go further into details.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman answer a question or two about the bill?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The only provision that is calculated to improve the character of the service is this provision for inspection?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; the great feature of the bill, as I have tried to explain, is that the fees are all to be turned into the United States Treasury. One of the great evils of the service has been the unofficial fees, which the consuls could charge any price they chose for.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the bill provides now that all fees of all kinds in all consulates where receipts are below $1,000 shall be turned into the Treasury, and puts the consular officers entirely upon the basis of salaries?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Entirely.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In determining the salaries I notice it is said in the report here that it will amount to a saving of one hundred and odd thousand dollars a year to the Government. Is adequate provision in the way of increase of salaries made for those consulates where the consular officers have been depending largely on the fees?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Entirely so. That is the way the classification has been made. It has been made very largely on the salaries.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Where will the saving of money come in?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will explain that to the gentleman. Some of the consulates at the important posts have been cut down, and that will make a saving to the Government. It is also proposed in one of the clauses of the bill that the charge for certifying invoices, instead of being fixed for all invoices irrespective of amounts, shall be charged on a sliding scale. That will make up the difference. The total increase is only $159,000, with the inspectors and everything charged up.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have in mind particularly the consulate at Calais, France. I know the consul there, and I have had the impression that he has been receiving upward of $4,000 in the way of fees and salaries. This bill gives him a salary of $3,000. The business at that consulate, it seems to me, is one of considerable importance. He certifies invoices from which the Government receives from five to six or eight million dollars of revenue annually. Is the salary of $3,000 there based upon the receipts of that office, or is the gentleman informed in respect to that particular consulate?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That and all other consulates are tried to be equalized in this bill. Some were getting too much and others were getting too little. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman from Michigan inform me on that point?

Mr. DENBY. The consul at Calais under this bill, if it passes, will receive an increase of $350. The attempt of the bill is to equalize the salaries to-day. Under the proposed bill that is what the salary plus the unofficial fees now amount to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. So that there will be an increase there?

Mr. DENBY. So that in the case of Calais there is a slight increase.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think there ought to be at that point.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the unanimous indorsement of the members of that committee. It represents an evolution in the consular service. It makes a step forward. This service was instituted by the act of July 1, 1790, and April 14, 1792, and half a century elapsed before Congress showed any further interest in our consular service. When the act of 1856 was passed it slightly enlarged the service and corrected certain abuses therein by closer supervision of the fees. No legislation of importance in reference to this service has been enacted since that time.

The pending bill provides, first, for the classification of the consular service; second, for the appointment of inspectors to regularly and carefully inspect the consulates; third, to abolish all fees and fix a stipulated salary for all consuls; fourth, to Americanize the service; fifth, to prohibit consuls from being interested in the practice of law; and, sixth, to equalize the fees for invoices.

It has other minor changes. It does not completely reorganize the service, but it goes a long way in that direction.

One feature which will undoubtedly prove of value to American interests and prestige is the requirement that clerks in American consulates shall be American citizens—that is, wherever the salary of the clerk exceeds $1,000. At present many of these clerks are citizens of the country in which the consulate is located, and it is apparent that it may often be to the personal advantage of these clerks as well as to the feelings of loyalty to their own nation to impede rather than promote the foreign commerce and the general interests of this country. It frequently happens that when consuls are new at their posts the clerks are much better informed in reference to the business of the consulate than the consuls themselves, so it results that the commercial interests of this country are committed to the hands of people who are alien to her by birth and in sentiment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has any provision been made in this bill for the salaries of clerks attached to the consulates?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any provision of law for the gradation of salaries of clerks?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That is done in the appropriation bill under contingent expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salaries do clerks receive that are attached to the consulates?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that that will be fixed by the regular appropriation bill, and is not dealt with at all in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should it not have been dealt with, as clerical services are part of the service attached to the consulates?

Mr. FLOOD. Because the purpose of this bill was to classify the consulates and not to go into the details of those employed in those consulates.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can you give the salaries that are paid to the clerks? Are there any grades with specified salaries?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; there are grades, but I have not time now to go into that, as I have only a few minutes. That will come up for consideration when the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill is brought in for consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my question, if the gentleman will pardon me, is section 5 of the bill as reported by the committee; that limits the clerical positions which pay a thousand dollars or more to American citizens, and the query arises whether consuls-general or consuls could obtain the services of American citizens if the salary limitation established was as low as $1,000.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, they are only limited in case the salary is $1,000 or more. The gentleman may be correct in saying that we can not get American clerks for $1,000, but I do not think so; but if the gentleman is correct, he should try to amend the appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are providing in this bill by special provision of law that no person except American citizens shall fill clerical positions where the salary is $1,000 or more. You might cripple the service if the consuls could not obtain American citizens to fill those positions.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think that would be the case. I think this is a wise provision. It would Americanize the consulates all over the world, but if it is found that there is danger of the service being crippled, this trouble can be corrected in the annual appropriation bills.

Mr. Speaker, this bill further proposes to pay all consuls a salary fixed on the basis of the commercial importance of the place, the cost of living there, and the present salary received, and requires all fees collected by the consul to be turned into the Treasury. There is no doubt about the fact that the fee system has made some of the consulates scandalously profitable and scandalous in other ways.

It is the policy of this Government to abolish the fee system in all of its branches, and there never was a branch of the service in which this reform was more needed than it is in the consular service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill, which I have only just received and looked at casually, provides anywhere the manner of appointment of consuls hereafter and the tenure of office?

Mr. FLOOD. No; it does not change the present system. The consuls can be changed at the end of each Administration—just as they are now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It simply fixes the compensation?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no; it does this, but it does much more. It classifies the consulates and has other important provisions.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is no provision for getting rid of consuls they have in the service who have not reflected credit upon our Government?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; there is such a provision, and it is a very important part of this bill. Inspectors are provided to inspect the consulates once a year and make report to the State Department, and the consuls who have not reflected credit upon our country can be removed and the inspector put in charge of the consulate until a full investigation is had.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has the committee under consideration any bill providing for the fixing of a permanent tenure of office?

Mr. FLOOD. There was such a provision in the bill when it was introduced in the Senate. That provision was stricken out by the Senate, and there is no such bill now pending before the committee of this House.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that the bill does not have the importance that I thought it had.

Mr. FLOOD. We thought we would meet very much less opposition by eliminating that provision.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

Mr. FLOOD. I will answer it if I have the time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to know about what difference this change in system will make from the fee system to the salary system? Has the gentleman from Virginia made any estimate so as to know whether the Government will be out more money?

Mr. FLOOD. About $170,000 more.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman a part of my time.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will take some of his time now.

Mr. MANN. I want the gentleman from Virginia to take some of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the gentleman say it will cost the Government $170,000 more?

Mr. FLOOD. It will cost the Government in the next year about $170,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Per year.

Mr. FLOOD. Per year.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I would like to say, for the further information of the gentleman, that there is a provision in one clause of the bill which provides that the certificates of invoice shall be charged hereafter on a sliding scale, in proportion to the amount of the invoice instead of, as at present, a fixed fee of $2.50, which will raise sufficient revenue, in the judgment of the Department, to make up any increase in the charge.

Mr. MANN. Now will the gentleman from Virginia yield to a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the position of the committee in reporting the bill, the first is that they have fixed salaries?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now the first proposition we meet in the bill is an amendment offered by the House Committee, inserting for the consul at Manchester, England, a salary of $6,000 a year. Will the gentleman say what the salary of that office was before? If the gentleman can not inform the House, I can.

Mr. DENBY. If the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. MANN. In the appropriation bill for last year we provided a salary for the consul at Manchester of $3,000.

Mr. FLOOD. But he got the fees in addition to the $3,000 salary.

Mr. MANN. But what was the amount of the fees?

Mr. FLOOD. The fees and the salary amounted to about $6,000.

Mr. MANN. Is not the consul provided for in class 3, and you propose to make a consul-general of him?

Mr. FLOOD. He is a consul-general now, having been appointed by the President since the last appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. MANN. The President had no authority to appoint him.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Nobody but the President has authority to appoint a consul under the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. And the President can not appoint him unless Congress authorized him to do so.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Under the Constitution the President has the right, and Congress can not create any person consul without being guilty of an infraction of the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. What are we doing if we are not creating them now?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. We are not creating them; we are fixing the salaries.

Mr. MANN. You are creating them. You are creating this consul-general.

Mr. FLOOD. We are classifying the service and fixing the salaries.

Mr. MANN. That is what I want to get at. Now, here is this position which the committee submits, and I ask the committee why they have a consul-general there?

Mr. FLOOD. Because there is a consul-general there now. The grade was changed by the Senate and we thought it proper to restore it.

Mr. MANN. I find that we make an appropriation for a consul there at $3,000.

Mr. FLOOD. And since that appropriation was made the consulate has been raised by the President to a consulate-general, with salary and fees amounting to about $6,000. The policy of the Administration is to raise the grade to consul-general at any post where European countries have this grade.

Mr. MANN. Now, why does the committee propose here to appropriate $6,000 for a salary of a consul-general at this place? He has no authority outside of Manchester.

Mr. DENBY. Let me answer. The consul-general at Manchester——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Virginia can not answer, I will allow the gentleman to answer.

Mr. FLOOD. I believe I have answered the gentleman fully.

Mr. DENBY. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that the net increase in the salary by the present bill will be $402.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is, over the amount of the fees, it will be that much more?

Mr. DENBY. That is, for the last year the fees as reported to the State Department, plus the salary, considering that in comparison with the salary allowed in this bill; in the future it will be $402 more than by the last fiscal report.

Mr. MANN. For the last year?

Mr. DENBY. It has only been in operation one year.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the appointment of five inspectors, to be known as "consuls-general," to be located in different territories, to make annual inspections of all of our consulates.

There can be no doubt about the imperative necessity of such a provision in order that the State Department can become acquainted with the character and competency of our multitudinous consuls, to prevent incompetent, dishonest, and disreputable consuls from bringing dishonor on our nation. Instances where consuls have done this for long periods of time without the knowledge of the State Department are numerous, and under the present law the State Department has no method of ascertaining these conditions, except by casual reports sent in by travelers or people who have business with the consuls. This is a long-felt need of the consular service and will result in much good.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a few questions.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. LACEY. This bill does not require consuls to settle estates, but you do provide that any money they receive for settling estates shall be turned into the Treasury. What is to prevent the consuls from declining to settle estates? You require him, if he does settle an estate, to turn the money into the Treasury, but you do not require him to do it.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that that question was not carefully considered by the committee. It was assumed that any consul would take pleasure in doing any proper and reasonable service for a countryman. I do not know that the settlement of estates is a proper function of a consul.

Mr. LACEY. The statute requires them to take a deposition. They are required to take it by section 7. They ought to be made to do that and the fees should be turned in, but you do not require them to settle estates.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Iowa is right about that.

Mr. LACEY. Well, it is a convenience to get a consul to settle an estate, because you want some one you have confidence in.

Mr. FLOOD. The information before the committee was that many consuls do not now do such work as settling estates, but that they refer all parties interested to some native lawyer who would charge a large enough fee to divide with the consul, and for that reason a provision was inserted in this bill prohibiting a consul from practicing law or being interested in any way in the practice of law.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. In other words, he uses the office as a means of graft.

Mr. FLOOD. That was the conclusion reached by the committee.

Mr. LACEY. Section 8 says that all fees received for settling estates should be accounted for. What I am trying to get at is this: A few days ago I sent a power of attorney to Frankfort-on-the-Main, directing the consul-general to go to the bank and draw some money for a constituent. Now, under the custom, he would charge a reasonable amount for that, but he can decline to perform that duty under this bill because he is not required to, and if he does perform this duty on that account he must turn the proceeds into the Treasury, consequently he declines to perform the duty. I think the bill should be amended so as to require that the consuls should not only take depositions but he should settle estates.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield a few minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FLOOD. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his courtesy. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa. I do not think any consul would refuse such a request as he made of the consul-general just referred to, and therefore do not think his amendment important.

Mr. Speaker, while most of the provisions of this bill are important, undoubtedly the most important of all is the classification of the consular service.

This classification makes a new departure, a distinct forward step in our national career.

The history of the country from the beginning to the present day has been a series of forward movements, making an evolution, so to speak, in our career as a nation. The Constitution under which we live was the first instance of the process of evolution. The Articles of Federation under which the war of the Revolution was fought were found sufficiently strong as long as the cohesive power of a common danger held the colonies together, but when independence was accomplished they proved to be a rope of sand. When "in order to form a more perfect union" the convention at Philadelphia framed the Federal compact or Constitution of Government, a great stride was made, for it was, as Lord Chatham declared, the most consummate achievement of statecraft that ever emanated from the human brain. The thirteen original States have grown to be forty-five in number, and yet such is the adaptability of the Constitution, that as State after State has been admitted it has included them all, extending its ægis across the continent, as—

> You have seen on high
> The rainbow, based on oceans, span the sky.

Advancing as we now are into the second century of our national existence, if from a mount of observation we look back upon the road which we have traveled we shall see that it is marked by successive steps of growth or evolution of nationality.

This evolution has been chiefly along three lines—commercial, belligerent, and political. The commercial evolution is told in few figures. In 1805 our imports amounted to $120,000,000 and our exports to $95,000,000, the balance of trade being against us to the extent of $25,000,000. In 1855 our imports amounted to $257,000,000 and our exports to $218,000,000, a great increase, but the balance of trade was still against us. In 1904 our imports were $991,000,000 and our exports amounted to $1,460,000,000, the balance of trade being in our favor by $469,000,000. These figures show a most remarkable development in our commerce.

In order to secure to an American citizen as much security upon an American ship as he enjoyed upon American soil we fought the war of 1812 with England. The successful termination of that war gave us prestige and increased consideration in the eyes of the world.

As a consequence of the annexation of Texas, we fought the Mexican war, carrying our victorious flag from the Rio Grande to the halls of the Montezumas, and acquired by the terms of peace the vase territory of New Mexico and California. This gave us a new sense of power and still greater consideration in the family of nations.

The last display of our military prowess was when we went to war with Spain in order to deliver the neighboring island of Cuba from the unendurable oppression of a foreign yoke. I am not able to contemplate the sequel of that war with much satisfaction. It introduced into our nomenclature the phrase "a world power," a phrase that is fraught with dangerous possibilities. If to account ourselves "a world power" means to forget the admonitions of the fathers and founders of the Republic against intermeddling with the affairs of European nations and to enter upon a scheme of foreign conquest and territorial acquisition, then indeed the sequel of that war was most deplorable. By the treaty of Paris, in an evil hour we laid our grasping hand upon a savage archipelago 10,000 miles away, in the very sight of the domes and turrets of Asiatic cities. Now, to hold it and to preserve the peace our soldiers are engaged in the barbarous work of massacring women and children.

As the silver queen of night passed over this continent she looked down upon State after State, extending from the stormy Atlantic to the yellow sands of the Pacific. As in her westward journey she passed through the Golden Gate, we should have bid her adieu, and not have followed to where she held midnight court with her Australian stars.

In the evolutionary steps along political lines are those that appertain to our diplomatic service. The creation in 1894 of plenipotentiaries with the rank of ambassador to represent us in the most important foreign countries marked a forward step in our diplomatic service. Inasmuch as the representatives of other governments at these courts enjoyed this title, being one of precedence over that of minister, it was necessary that our representatives at these courts should possess this rank in order that they might enjoy an equal consideration with the plenipotentiaries of other nations.

This bill, if enacted into law, will constitute a similar important forward step in the consulate service. While the evolution of progress has characterized other branches of our Government, this has not been the case with the consular service. This service has not kept pace with the progress and development of the country.

I believe the changes in the present system are needed. The President and Secretary of State believe it. Commercial bodies all over the country are asking for the passage of this bill. The commercial interests of the country demand it. The press, that mirror of public sentiment, is almost a unit for it.

I have heard but two objections urged to its passage. One is that it would cut down the compensation of some overpaid consuls; the other that it would deprive some Members of the other side of this House of the political patronage which they now exercise. These are hardly objections that could be seriously urged. It is not claimed that the consuls whose compensation will be reduced will not, under this bill, be well paid for their services, and surely the time has not come when "the guardianship and fostering of our rapidly expanding foreign commerce, the protection to American citizens resorting to foreign countries in the lawful pursuit of their affairs, and the maintenance of the dignity of our nation" should be subordinated to the petty desire for political patronage.

I am glad to say that no such considerations as I have indicated will influence a single vote on this side of the House. The Democrats will support this measure because they believe it is right and that it is necessary.

In examining this question I have been surprised to learn that the South is practically unrepresented in the consular service. Notwithstanding this fact, which is a great injustice to that section, the southern Members are supporting this bill—supporting it because its passage will advance the commercial interest of the whole country. We trust, however, that this injustice to our section will be remedied. Many of the States of the South, such as Georgia and Alabama, are without any representation in this service, and such is practically true of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor.

Is the Republican party of these States so poor in material that there can not be found in them any man belonging to that party whom a Republican President would trust with a commission of this kind? [Applause.] If this is the case, is it expecting too much of a National Administration to put aside party politics and, rising to a higher plane of patriotism, appoint some men whom it could trust though they belong to the opposite political party—men who know the South's history, her struggles, her interests, and her vast development during the past quarter of a century? The South is advancing in commercial prosperity more rapidly than any other section of this country. It is striding forward to that splendid destiny which we have every reason to believe a kind Providence, aided by the energies of man, has in store for her. A few figures will show how tremendous this progress of a quarter of a century has been:

| | 1880. | 1903. |
|---|---|---|
| Capital invested in cotton mills | $21,000,000 | $200,000,000 |
| Number of spindles | 667,000 | 8,250,200 |
| Bales of cotton consumed in southern mills | 225,000 | 2,000,000 |
| Value of cotton crop | 313,696,000 | 660,000,000 |
| Pig iron.....tons | 397,000 | 3,300,000 |
| Coal mined .....do | 6,000,000 | 62,000,000 |
| Value of lumber products | 37,000,000 | 200,000,000 |
| Capital invested in manufacturing | 257,000,000 | 1,200,000,000 |
| Value of manufactured products | 457,000,000 | 1,600,000,000 |
| Foreign exports through southern ports | 261,000,000 | 508,000,000 |
| Value of agricultural products | 660,000,000 | 1,700,000,000 |

This magnificent progress, with greater promise for the future, is entitled to more consideration than it has received from the present Administration. Secretary Root admits this, but it remains to be seen whether the President will recognize by his consular appointments in the future this stupendous increase of southern products and exports and the commanding place they occupy in our foreign commerce.

In the rapid evolution or development which I have described our country is differentiated from all other nations. The two great republics of antiquity knew no such experiences of frequent stages of expansion, nor has any modern nation experienced them.

The march of nations through history has been akin to the stately steppings of the gods in Homer—a stride is taken and centuries pass between. How different it is in this Republic! In the first century of our existence we have developed into a great power and have carried our prowess in arms and our achievements in commerce to the point where we possess the respect and deference that belongs to the foremost nation of the world. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the very beautiful and eloquent peroration with which my friend from Virginia has just closed his speech suggests the intense interest in this question, that is based either upon the personal equation or upon the denial to him and to me of the right of selection for these places, and it touches directly upon the point I had in my mind, concerning which I want to interrogate the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMS].

I thought from his cry of jubilation when he got the floor that we were to have a consular bill that would reform the entire administration of our commercial representation abroad. It develops now, however, under the close questioning of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that this is almost exclusively confined to a classification of the consuls and to the fixing of their compensation, the net result of which is an additional charge upon the people of the United States of $170,000 a year. I have yet been unable to find any compensating advantage for that increased cost. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that this committee would bring forward a measure for the complete reorganization and reformation of the consular service. It has been my fortune, sir, to travel somewhat throughout the world, and in the course of my business career I have had considerable experience in foreign countries. I regret to say that in too many instances it causes shame to any respectable American to be brought into contact with or knowledge of existing conditions so far as the consular service of this country is concerned. In my own experience I have frequently found the consular service wholly inadequate for the demands of commerce and of traveling Americans. I have seen representatives of this Government accredited to our neighboring Republic of Mexico who, if I may judge by their conduct there, were sent away from their own country for their country's good.

Mr. FLOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to have such service inspected by intelligent and competent gentlemen and, wherever that condition prevails, to let the State Department here know about it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have only once read this paragraph providing for inspectors at $5,000 a year. I have not yet been able to catch the full import of that paragraph. I have not yet been able to determine what would be their powers under this bill.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They would correct the very evils which the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No doubt they would make recommendations.

Mr. FLOOD. They can stop such things.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; but suppose their recommendations come back here and come in conflict with the wishes of an eminent Senator who has sent some friend of his to a consular post?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The result of the last inspection by a special inspector was the removal of three consuls in China. Therefore, when these inspectors do report to the Department, the Department acts. At least, that has been our experience heretofore, and I think we may assume that that will be the conduct of the State Department in the future. Hence the importance of these inspectors.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the gentleman's impression is correct.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. It is founded on the experience of the immediate past.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think some reformation of that kind is due to the country and the people who have business abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the committee upon one good feature of this bill. That is section 4, providing for five inspectors of consulates. I offered that provision in the bill as an amendment to the last diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and met with the objection of the committee, which since that time seems to have reformed its views and gained information. I thank it for that compliment. However, the merit of it is due to Mr. Frederick Emery, formerly connected with the Department of State; and if the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House would sit at the feet of Mr. Emery for some time longer, they would be able to bring in a bill of some value to the country outside of this one section.

There has been a demand on the part of the business interests of the country for the reformation of the consular service. The people who transact business with representatives of the United States in foreign countries desire that there shall be an efficient and proper consular service abroad, capable of transacting the business of this country and protecting the interests of our business people.

That demand culminated in a bill introduced in Congress for a reformation and reorganization of the consular service. It was hoped that it might result in a law which would create a consular service which would be the pride of the country; but what has been the result? Almost every good provision in the bill as it was first introduced has been taken out of the bill. The bill as it stands now, outside of the provision which I have referred to, is a bill mainly to increase salaries under the guise of reorganizing the salary list. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], just called attention to a provision which will render this bill of great hardship as it now stands, to the foreign people of this country. Every Member of the House knows that constantly or frequently a constituent of his interested in some estate in a foreign land, appeals to him for information as to how to get help in having the estate settled in the foreign land, and he is referred to the consular representative of the Government. Now, under the existing law, the consular representative is not required to render that service. He does it because he is paid for it, unofficially. Under this bill he can not take the pay without turning it into the Government. The result will be that he will not do the work.

Mr. OTJEN. Does the gentleman not think it is a good provision to do away with all fees and fixed salaries for the consuls?

Mr. MANN. I certainly do.

Mr. OTJEN. Well, that is another good provision of the bill.

Mr. MANN. That is another good provision of the bill. My objection to the bill is not that it does not contain some good features, but that it is brought in here on suspension day with no opportunity to amend it, and put in additional good provisions. Instead of being a complete measure, it is a very small crust from the loaf. We ought to have a bill which could be considered in the House. The Members of the House ought to have an opportunity to amend the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand very well that under the circumstances this bill will pass the House, under suspension of the rules, but it will not meet the demand of the country for a proper consular reorganization. I know the Members of the House are very largely afraid of civil service reform in the consular service. I have no such fear. If I had my way about it, I would have a school for consular representatives, and for diplomatic representatives, as we have schools for the Navy and for the Army. I believe it is just as important, or more so, to educate the men we send abroad to represent us as it is to educate the Army and the Navy.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois why it is that we are to be represented at Manchester by a consul-general and at Liverpool by a consul? I notice in the bill as prepared by the Secretary of State, if it was prepared by that gentleman, that originally Manchester was but a consulate. It is now to be represented by a consul-general.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] undoubtedly did not hear the colloquy which took place over here a little while ago when I asked the identical questions of the members of the committee and without any answer.

Mr. FLOOD. But the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. No explanation has been given.

Mr. FLOOD. But here is an explanation.

Mr. MANN. There is no explanation for it.

Mr. FLOOD. But the gentleman will not hear an explanation. There is an explanation, but the gentleman from Illinois persists in not hearing it.

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Speaker, I gave the gentleman seven minutes to make an explanation, through my courtesy, and if he made one I did not hear it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. But who pretends to answer questions on this measure?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Why, Mr. Speaker, there are plenty of questions that have been answered. The gentleman has been answered, and he will be answered again.

Mr. DENBY. The condition with regard to Manchester is simply this——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit an answer to the question?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois has already yielded seven minutes to the gentleman's side of the question, and he should now take a little of his own time. Otherwise I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY].

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois insinuates there is some crooked work in regard to the classification of this service, and he began by picking——

Mr. MANN. I did not insinuate anything of the sort——

Mr. DENBY. Pardon me, now; it is our time. And he began by picking out Manchester. Now, the only reason why Manchester was restored by the committee to the position of consulate-general, which it held before, and from which the Senate lowered it to a consulate, was because there were three or four other places so treated, concerning which a great protest went up throughout the country from various persons because there seemed no reason why we should take consulates which had been consulate-generals and lower them to consulates.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. DENBY. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I will be glad for the gentleman to state for the information of the House what is the difference between a consulate-general and a consulate. In a word, what does it amount to?

Mr. DENBY. The difference, as I understand it, between a consulate-general and a consulate is none whatever in power. It is simply in dignity, and the only reason the consulate-general is maintained in the American service is because our service conforms to the usage of the world with regard to the consular service.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DENBY. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not that distinction a matter of very great importance abroad, however?

Mr. DENBY. It is a matter of great importance abroad.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, will the gentleman kindly answer as to the relative importance of Manchester and of Liverpool, as to our interest in those two places, and the necessity of having a greater dignity in our representatives abroad at those places?

Mr. DENBY. I will say in regard to Manchester that under the bill it receives an increase of $402. In regard to Liverpool it receives an increase of less than $25. Liverpool is, of course, very much more important than Manchester. The population of Manchester is 534,000, and the exports to the United States are over $10,000,000 annually and the notarial fees amount to $1,597. We did not, however, take Manchester and create a consulate-general out of it. We simply restored what we found existing and what the Senate of the United States had reduced to a consulate.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DENBY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAHON. Taking it from a commercial standpoint, is not Liverpool a hundred times greater than Manchester?

Mr. DENBY. The commercial standing of Liverpool is less than double that of Manchester, according to the reports made to the United States.

Mr. MAHON. But the exports?

Mr. DENBY. Liverpool exports to the United States $18,000,000.

Mr. MAHON. How about Manchester?

Mr. DENBY. Manchester exports $10,000,000.

Mr. MAHON. Then why do you not give a consulate-general to Liverpool?

Mr. DENBY. Because, as I stated before, we did not create a consulate-general at Manchester. We found it in the service, and we restored it because there seemed——

Mr. MAHON. Then why did you take the consulate-general from Liverpool?

Mr. DENBY. Because we did not find it a consulate-general.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. DENBY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Michigan please tell us what the receipts were at Bordeaux last year?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. DENBY. Certainly.

Mr. FLOOD. Is it not a fact that the Administration fixes the title of consulate or consulate-general in order to meet the consular offices of other countries?

Mr. DENBY. I have so intimated, and stated our system conforms to the system of the countries abroad, and our service would lose in dignity if we attempted to abolish the office of consulate-general. The exports to the United States from Bordeaux amounted to $4,800,000.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How about Antwerp?

Mr. DENBY. I would like——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I am very sorry to break in on the gentleman's time. I understand we have but one hour on each side for the discussion of this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Only twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman such time as I have left.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania (continuing). Without any opportunity to amend it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman such time as I have remaining.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I ask now in all fairness——

Mr. DENBY. I will tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania anything I can in reference to the bill. The exports to the United States from Antwerp amount to over $11,000,000 by the last fiscal report.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Four million dollars at Bordeaux, and $11,000,000 at Antwerp.

Mr. DENBY. Yes. Now, I would like, if I may, say I am very glad to answer any questions I can in reference to the bill. If I might add a few words in reference to what the gentleman from Illinois says, that we should not take half a loaf because we can not get a whole loaf, I have only to say that it has been notorious that all the business interests of the United States have been in favor of consular reform for a great many years. The gentleman from Illinois says that this bill does not meet the demand of the business interests. There sat in the city of Washington last week a consular-reform association, composed of business men of the highest standing from all over the United States, and they indorsed this bill as it came from the committee.

Mr. MANN. After they had been told they could not do any better.

Mr. DENBY. They indorsed it with regret that it did not contain the section of the bill passed by the Senate. However, they indorsed it and asked that it pass. That is the answer of the business interests of the country with reference to this bill. In regard to this bill, specifically, it does four great things that are regarded as very necessary. It makes a system of consular inspection, the need of which has been felt ever since the service has been founded, because the consuls are often appointed to places of obscurity and left without supervision; and every other branch of the service of the country is under a system of inspection quite as drastic as that of consular inspection as proposed. As to the expense of the service, it is the cheapest service in all the world, and it would not be becoming as great a country as this to hesitate to increase the pay of the consular service $169,000, if by so doing we can greatly benefit that service. It is a matter of absolute certainty that the abolition of the fee system will destroy the most fruitful source of difficulty and disorder in our service, and it is a matter of absolute certainty that the inspection system will add so greatly to the efficiency of the service that within three years, I venture to predict, the service will not alone be self-supporting, but will return revenue.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman mean to be understood that our representatives abroad are men who for a fee would do anything wrong?

Mr. DENBY. Not the slightest. I say in regard to our present consular service, it is the best in the world, and I think there are in the service many men looking after the interests of their fellow-citizens in the obscurity of foreign ports who are absolute heroes, and who have carried the flag for us under inadequate salaries and under very great discouragement for years. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes' time that I have remaining I wish to say to my colleagues that this legislation is before this House entirely for the benefit of the business interests of this country. There were certain forces opposed to this legislation, and, as I said before, for sixteen years efforts have been made to secure the proposed legislation. It does not go as far as the believers in consular reform would have it go, but it does and will accomplish a great deal in the direction of the improvement of our consular service. For that reason I urge and hope that this House will respond to the demand of the business interests of this country and pass this bill. It will go a long way in the movement that is now occupying the time of our merchants for the enlargement of our foreign commerce, for these are our advance pickets, sent throughout the world to furnish the merchants the necessary information to enlarge their business abroad. It will be a great service to them and to our country, and I hope this House will pass this bill, as it has already passed the Senate.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill as amended was passed.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported the bill (H. R. 16953) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] had intended to ask that all points of order be reserved.

Mr. PAYNE. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order.

EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, pending the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if this is preliminary to an investigation of the expenditures in that Department?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is offered with the expectation that there will be material to print.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I should like to ask the gentleman the character of the printing.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It will be matter for the use of the committee. The first thing to be printed, I will say to the gentleman, is the list of expenditures made by the Department of Agriculture, when that list shall be submitted to the committee. We wish it printed for the use of the committee. Whether there will be any other items will depend on what is developed before the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

SHOSHONE INDIAN RESERVATION, WYO.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 117) extending the time for opening to public entry the unallotted lands on the ceded portion of the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in Wyoming, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the time for opening to public entry the ceded portion of the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in Wyoming, having been fixed by law as the 15th day of June, 1906, it is hereby provided that the time for opening said reservation shall be extended to the 15th day of August, 1906, unless the President shall determine that the same may be opened at an earlier date.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is introduced at the request of the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment to the bill S. 956—the Alaska Delegate bill—and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The bill does not seem to be at the Clerk's desk. While search is being made for it the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS].

LA PLATA COUNTY (COLO.) LAND GRANTS.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 16381) leasing and demising certain lands in La Plata County to the P. F. U. River Company. As the bill has been read once, I move that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read on Friday last, when unanimous consent was asked for its consideration.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the Chair then stated that unanimous consent had not been given.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the gentleman from Colorado now moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to twenty minutes.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this is the bill which was brought up on Friday by unanimous consent. The House was pretty well advised with regard to it at that time. The purpose of the bill is indicated in the report. It is to lease for a period of ten years to a rubber company certain lands in La Plata County, Colo., with the privilege of purchasing at the termination of the lease. There is very little to say in addition to what was said at that time. The necessity for the development of the rubber industry in this country is something pretty well recognized. The demand has increased very much more rapidly than the supply, and meanwhile no new sources of adequate supply are being found. Last year we imported about 75,000,000 pounds of crude rubber, and in the last few years the price of rubber has increased so rapidly that the pure rubber itself has become very expensive and is a most important article of commerce. New uses are constantly arising, and the developing of a domestic supply would be of very great value to the whole country.

The various departments to which this bill was submitted have unanimously approved of the passage of the bill making certain recommendations, every one of which have been incorporated into the bill. The land that is sought to be affected is nonagricultural and nonirrigable lands, lying up on the foothills of the mountains beyond the possibility of any useful purpose as far as agriculture is concerned, except grazing to a limited extent. There are no minerals thereon and the provisions of the bill exclude the grant of mineral found to be contained in the lands.

To render this restriction effective there is a further provision in the bill that during the ten years duration lease the Interior Department shall have the lands examined to determine the presence or absence of minerals. The Department of Agriculture has recognized the importance of this development, the Department of Indian Affairs has cordially consented to it, and the Department of the Interior approves of it. The provisions of the bill direct that the proceeds of the land be devoted to the southern Utes who originally held the title, and further stipulate that in the operations to be carried on under the bill for this period of ten years preference shall be given, so far as may be, to the Indian labor. Mr. Speaker, I think I do not care to say anything more at this time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What are the terms of the lease?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The rental is to be not less than 3 cents an acre, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds of this rental are to be paid to the Department for the use of the Indians. I will say that that is about the ordinary rental price of such land in that section of the country, perhaps a little lower, but there is much land leased at 5 cents an acre.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Only 3 cents an acre? I would give it to them before I would take as little as that.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I think the gentleman from Georgia is, in a measure, correct, because there is very little present rental value to that land. That figure is based largely on the rentals of State lands similarly situated and of as little value.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the situation of the lands at the end of the lease? Can they leave them in any state they please?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. It will simply be cultivated; that is all. There is nothing that can be done to it that will injure it. It is a high, elevated mesa, above the line of any irrigation ditch, beyond the possibility of irrigation, beyond any possibility of being watered by artesian wells. It is simply a high foot-hill mesa, as it is called. It is covered with this weed, the initials of which are indicated in the name of the company, which grows in very many places, from New Mexico to Dakota, but which is utterly worthless for any other purpose. This is the weed from which the rubber is to be extracted. The necessity for the development and experimentation is due to the fact that very little is known about the culture of this plant. Its reproduction is slow and rather uncertain, and at present it has an irregular rubber content, some specimens having 3 and 4, some 10, and some as high as 20 or 30 per cent of rubber.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that. Are they limited to the growing of this weed or can they graze the land?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. They are limited to the development of this experiment. Everything is to be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior—all the improvements, all the roads, buildings, and everything of that sort are under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. At the expense of the company?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. At the expense of the company. This lease puts no charge whatever upon the Government. It involves the possibility of the development of a very important industry without any expense at all to the Government. On the contrary, it becomes an immediate source of revenue to the wards of the Government, for whom this land is now held.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not expected that the plant will be cultivated?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. This plant is a perennial weed. It is a little shrub; it is pulled by the roots; there are small rootlets left in the ground, and these roots reproduce the plant. The period of reproduction is about three years. Now, the experiment is to see if the plant can not be reproduced from a seed, more certainly, in an improved form, with a larger and more regular rubber content, and in a quicker time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then there is to be some cultivation?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Oh, yes; a very extensive cultivation if the experiment is successful. The whole experiment is based upon plant selection and careful cultivation.

A MEMBER. How much is asked for an appropriation?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. There is no grant of anything from the Treasury. All that is granted is a ten years' lease at a small rental, with the option. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state candidly that I think with a little amendment this is a really meritorious proposition. It was shown to the Committee on Public Lands that this was land that was perhaps unsuited for almost anything else, and that these gentlemen were proposing to develop and exploit this rubber plant. It was shown to the committee that before there could be anything remunerative gotten out of the land to the company it would take three years' cultivation and development. An amendment was placed upon the bill making the minimum rental of 3 cents per acre, beginning at the time of the contract with the Secretary of the Interior. I believe these men who are proposing to operate it intend to do it in good faith. There is one proposition involved in it, and it is that alone that I desire to interpose my objections to, but I understand that the gentleman who offered the bill will not object to unanimous consent to the amendment that I desire to propose. That objectionable proposition in the bill is that any time they may go and buy this land from the Government at $1.25 per acre. In the hearings before the committee I asked gentlemen if they would lay out the land now and take the chances and pay $1.25 an acre. That they would not do. It seems to me it was unfair to demand all from the Government in dealing with the Government, and if the land should be found to be worth more than $1.25 an acre after these developments were made, I think the company should pay more for it. My desire is that it should be amended in line 24, on page 4, by saying that the President may, in his discretion, convey all of said lands, or any part thereof, by patenting the same to said rubber company, its successors and assigns, in fee and absolutely without restrictions, upon payment to the United States of such price as the Secretary of the Interior may fix, not less than $1.25 an acre, and thus leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to charge more than a dollar and a quarter an acre if it should be found to be worth more than that. I understand, from the intimation of one of the gentlemen from Colorado a moment ago, that they would accept this amendment. If so, I have nothing further that I desire to say.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would be agreeable to him if the period during which the Secretary had his discretion to increase the price should be limited to the last five years of the lease, so that if these people should buy this land in the first five years they could get it at a better price?

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, I hardly think so, Mr. Speaker, because that fact might well be ascertained before that time, and I think all the chances ought not to be against the Government. I desire to say further in that connection that if this would not set a precedent, which I regard as a bad one, I would not interpose the objection I do to the passing of the bill; but I believe if this bill passes with that kind of a clause that every company and individual who desires to exploit lands of similar character in that country for any purpose whatever will come here with a similar bill and ask Congress to pass it, and refer to this bill as a precedent in favor of their bill.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman please restate his amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. In line 24, page 4, after the word "at," insert "such price as the Secretary of the Interior may fix, not less than $1.25 per acre."

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, while I do not think the amendment is really necessary or entirely proper, I am willing to defer to the gentleman on the committee, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Let us see what the amendment is. I understood the gentleman to say that he wanted to let anybody come in there for any purpose.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no; only for this company and for this particular land at such price as the Secretary of the Interior may fix, not less than $1.25 an acre—this particular land and company.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, page 4, after the word "at," insert the words "such price as the Secretary of the Interior may fix;" so that it will read "such price as the Secretary of the Interior may fix, not less than $1.25 an acre."

The SPEAKER. This would have to be by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask if this bill authorizes the sale of this land now to these people?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; I will read the second clause:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States may at any time during said period of ten years, at his discretion, terminate and cancel this lease by revoking the same and the annulling thereof in case the said experiment proposed or the use to be made of said lands shall be unsatisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior; or the President may, in his discretion, convey all of said lands, or any part thereof, by patenting the same.

As I understand, that is within the ten years. I would ask the chairman of the committee whether that is not his understanding?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, that is my understanding—that it is limited to the operation of the ten years.

Mr. MANN. The sale, as well.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would say to my colleague on the committee that the title of this land is in rather a peculiar situation. It is the Ute Reservation, and under the treaty by which it was opened to settlement it was open to cash settlement only. No homesteads were allowed on it. It was open to cash settlement at a dollar and a quarter an acre without limit, and that law is still in force; but two years ago a bill was passed also opening it to homestead settlement. This land could now be bought by these parties for $1.25 an acre by paying cash for it. They simply want to experiment to see if anything can be done with this rubber plant.

Mr, BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the committee guarded the proposition as to the mineral deposits in the bill.

Mr. LACEY. All mineral rights are excluded.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; that is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification proposed?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that this amendment proposes to sell it at a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. BURNETT. No; at such price as the Secretary of the Interior may fix; not less than $1.25 an acre.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday I received information that this is coal property, and while in a general sort of way, possibly, this bill guards the mineral rights of the Government, yet I doubt the wisdom of this lease with the new lights I now have. The information which I have in my hand, stating that this is coal land, was not before the committee a few days ago when this bill was first considered. Not a word was said then about coal. I was not present when it was finally considered, as I was ill and absent. Nothing was said Friday last about coal when this bill was being considered in this House.

Mr. LACEY. I will answer my friend——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just wait a minute; I think I have a little later information than the gentleman has. I telephoned a few minutes ago to the Geological Survey to find out what the facts were about this being coal land, and now I have a special message, which I have received since this bill was taken up, which telegram is addressed as follows:

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES:

In response to your telephone inquiry, township 34 north, range 11 west, Colorado, is classified as coal lands by our coal experts. Coal is now being mined directly north of the northeast corner of the township. The coal lies deep and has not been developed so far as we know. Mr. Campbell visited the region in 1905.

CHAS. D. WALCOTT, Director.

I cited Mr. Walcott to this bill, printed on page 4003 of the RECORD, telling him he would there see the land in question, and he then sent me this written message in reply.

Mr. Walcott by phone stated to me, "Everybody believes that land is valuable coal land." Mr. Speaker, the committee reported the bill here without this late information before it. "This survey is very recent," Mr. Walcott said. His men have just returned from out there, he said.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Pardon me——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to state, furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that land out there has been selling at $1.25 and $1.50 and $2 an acre which is worth five, ten, thirty, fifty, and sixty dollars an acre. The President and Secretary of the Interior and several commissions have recommended the repeal of certain laws, the stone and timber laws—which I expect ought to be repealed and better ones enacted simultaneously, but I am not fully advised of all the facts, but am investigating—to protect the Government rights in these lands, prevent them being sacrificed at $1.25 per acre, and yet the committee in this case, without this information, certainly not this definite and late information I have just received, have reported a bill here to give away this land at no more than a dollar and a quarter an acre; but by the wisdom and the industry of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] we have now opened a gap, so it is possible the Government can sell it for more. Now, if you will read this bill you will see that it contains language which gives exclusive rights to these lands to this company and withdraws them from the public land laws. Can we properly sell these coal lands thus encumbered? Why not sell them, if at all, just as they stand, to the highest and best bidder? Mr. Speaker, why should we agree to sell to this company and no other company, not sell to the highest bidder, not open to the world these coal lands of the West, when coal is scarcer out in the West than chicken teeth? I say, with this new evidence before us, the bill to that extent is absolutely vicious. Why not sell it, and as gum and coal land? We know to-day they are coal lands. Last week we did not. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY] agreed privately to an amendment which I wanted to propose and did propose, and in the best of faith. He came to my desk and did so during the debate. The gentleman who represents this concern and was before the committee came to me at the Willard Hotel yesterday and said he was in the gallery when I proposed this amendment and was extremely anxious for the gentleman who has this bill in charge to accept my amendment. Why? The gentleman said to me, on inquiry, his concern was not a part of the rubber trust. I asked him the naked question, and he said furthermore that he was afraid the rubber trust would crush him out, or swallow vi et armis this rich infant, this "golden egg," that is out here in the West and going to hatch out all of this rubber material.

So I offered this amendment to help him to stand up against and defy the trust. I will read my proposed amendment:

That all rights acquired hereby shall revest in the United States in the event that said company, or its successor or successors, shall enter into, directly or indirectly, any trust, combine, company, or other concern operating or existing contrary to the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," and its amendments.

Now, why did I do this? Because when this rubber trust comes up to this young infant and says, "You have got to sell to us," that infant can rise up and say, "The Government has made it impossible for me to do so; the Government has made me as big as you; the Government will not let me do it." If they proceed to sell, perforce or otherwise, to the rubber trust, the act is unlawful, and the right here given by this amendment revests in the United States for the benefit of the Indians, yet I am told to-day the gentleman declines to accept the amendment. Now, I ask the gentleman if he will accept it? I offer it in perfect good faith, absolutely in good faith, to help this young infant in its fight for life and success.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has asked me whether or not I would accept a certain amendment. Now, the bill is not my bill, but the company behind the bill is a corporation of the city of Detroit.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the gentleman representing this concern said he would accept and wanted the amendment.

Mr. DENBY. The gentleman from Tennessee says that I said on Friday——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On Saturday, that you would accept the amendment.

Mr. DENBY. On Friday, during the debate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On Friday—yes, Friday—in a private conversation.

Mr. DENBY. During the debate I said I would accept the amendment, and would have accepted the amendment at that time, in order to get the objection to the passage of the bill removed. May I ask the gentleman what the amendment provides?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The amendment provides exactly this. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. DENBY. Then may I change the form of my question? Does not the amendment provide that they may not unlawfully alienate this land?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will read it again:

That all rights acquired hereby shall revest in the United States in the event that said company, or its successor or successors, shall enter into, directly or indirectly, any trust, combine, company, or other concern operating or existing contrary to the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," and its amendments.

If this company disobeys this condition, all rights revert to the United States.

Mr. DENBY. Then, Mr. Speaker, in effect the amendment is simply that the company shall not unlawfully alienate their land after once coming into possession of it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not at all. I do not want the gentleman to take up all my time.

Mr. DENBY. I wish to explain the matter. You have brought my name in question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but you can get time from your side and answer me.

Mr. DENBY. Did you not call me to my feet?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did, and you decline to accept the amendment.

Mr. DENBY. So far as I am concerned, and speaking for the company, I decline to accept the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, all right; you agreed here Friday to accept it.

Mr. DENBY. I did.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman in the Willard stated voluntarily and unqualifiedly that he would accept it and wanted it. This amendment is to prevent this company from selling out to an unlawful monopoly, and prevents the monopoly from swallowing him and having his property transferred to this great rubber trust, that has been described by gentlemen from Colorado with such forensic and fiery eloquence.

Mr. DENBY. I have no knowledge of what the gentleman in the Willard may have said to the gentleman from Tennessee, nor do I understand that the gentleman in the Willard has a right to control the legislation of this House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please let me use my time and make his speech in the time of the gentleman from Colorado, who has the matter in charge?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say first that this bill ought to be defeated, and I say it to my friend from Alabama, for I believe that if he had had this coal information, that we now have received since this debate begun, that he would not agree to pass this bill; but we should strike out the provision of the bill which confines the Government of the United States to selling this rubber concern only or to any other at the price of $1.25 with this great coal possibility now known. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, and because the gentleman declines to accept this ounce of prevention that I offered on Friday, when he agreed to accept it as did this company's representative yesterday. I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], to an apparent oversight on his part. The original bill was not in the form of the bill reported. A provision was inserted in the new bill introduced to be reported by the committee in order to meet this question about coal, to prevent any complication arising under this bill as to this land being coal land. The suggestion was made that it possibly was coal land. To prevent the possibility of this bill being utilized to get coal lands from the Government at a reduced price, it was proposed to insert an amendment in the bill, and a new bill was introduced with this provision which I will read now, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, if he wants to interrupt me, after it is read. This is the proviso to section 3:

Provided, however, That no patent shall issue for the said land or any part thereof until the Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain by such examination, prospecting, and mineral tests as he may deem necessary and proper the existence of any valuable and merchantable deposits of coal or other mineral upon such premises; and any such merchantable deposits of coal or other mineral so determined, together with the right of ingress or egress, shall be excluded from said patent. The right of entry and egress for the purposes of such examination and tests shall further be reserved in said lease.

So that by special provision, if it should turn out within the ten years that the land is coal land, then the coal is reserved, and it will only apply to the surface of the land. It gives ten years to investigate and ascertain whether there is coal on the lands or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have investigated, and here is the report, which says there is coal there; they make the report to me for the purpose of bringing it in before this body to-day.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I want to say that the gentleman can speak in his own time and not in mine. I yielded to the gentleman from Iowa and not to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Colorado has no right to interrupt in this way.

Mr. LACEY. Now, if it is correct——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield. If it is true, as the gentleman from Tennessee states, that they have ascertained there is coal there, then this provision is immediately operative. We went a step further and provided that the Secretary should ascertain by mineral tests whether there was any coal there or not, and if there was to reserve it. The gentleman from Tennessee says coal is already found. If so, under the provisions of this bill the coal will be reserved. The gentleman from Tennessee was not present in the committee when the bill was considered; if he had been he would not have made the objection. The matter was examined and the question of coal was provided for in the bill. It is fully protected. The rubber company can not use this bill to obtain title to coal lands.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this legislation ought to pass. Several years ago the discovery was made that the pinquay weed of the Southwest contained in its roots a substance that might be used, or certain gentlemen thought might be used, as a substitute for rubber. In order that those interested in demonstrating the fact whether this plant can be so used may have an opportunity to do it, it is proposed that we lease to them, at a rental to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, a small tract of land now practically valueless, yielding the Government nothing at all, and which we would have been glad to have sold any time in the last twenty-five years for $1.25 an acre.

These people propose on that tract to erect buildings, select and cultivate the pinquay weed, and it is provided that any time within ten years after the passage of the act they may purchase, if they see fit, the land, at a price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior at not less than $1.25 an acre.

The moderation and modesty of these gentlemen is marvelous. Ordinarily gentlemen desiring to have experimentation carried on in the line of agriculture come to the committees and ask large and juicy appropriations for carrying on the work. We have been paying some gentlemen in Pinehurst, in the Carolinas, $10,000 a year for some years, and I suppose will continue to do so indefinitely, for the purpose of experimenting in the growth of tea, and occasionally the Members of Congress receive a package of this tea as a token of the fact that the money is actually being expended. These gentlemen who propose to carry on the experiment for the purpose of determining whether one of the now worthless weeds of the Southwest can be made valuable and useful, not only for their benefit but to the vast advantage of us all, ask nothing of us except that we shall give them an opportunity to lease a small tract of the public domain, now practically valueless, for this purpose. The gentleman from Tennessee, armed cap-a-pie, with a pinquay-weed lance, as becomes the champion trust buster of the House, is fearful that these gentlemen, while carrying on their experiments, will be overwhelmed by the rubber trust, and he rushes to their defense with an amendment that they shall not sell out. Gentlemen, let us give them an opportunity to begin their operations at least before we allow ourselves to become alarmed lest they capitulate to the rubber trust, if such there be. It does not occur to me, if we are to successfully demolish the trust octopus, that this is exactly an effective way to begin the attack. It is beginning at the very small end of the horn. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield that time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this coal testimony was not before the committee when this bill was first considered. I know it was not. I was present that day, but not the day it was reported. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has been trying to get certain laws—the stone and timber acts—repealed so as to keep the Government from being compelled to sell these lands at $1.25 an acre, inasmuch as the land is far more valuable, and yet the gentleman agrees to report this bill with the $1.25 proposition in it, and not only that, but instead of giving the people—all the people—a chance to purchase it, he compels the Government to sell it to this rubber concern. Now, selling coal lands to a rubber concern! That is a fine purchaser! Why does not the gentleman open the gates by striking out this limiting provision, and if it is a coal territory—and Mr. Walcott says that it is—sell it as coal land and not as worthless land? Why doesn't he try to carry out the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of the Interior as to these lands instead of sacrificing them to this syndicate corporation? Here is land worth from $5 to $10 or perhaps $100 an acre to be sold for $1.25 an acre. And this after the gentleman from Iowa has been trying to get the laws repealed which compel the Government to sell them for $1.25 an acre.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I do not yield to the gentleman. The gentleman can reply in his own time; my time is too brief, though I want to be courteous.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. You can go out there now and get any quantity of the adjoining land for one dollar and a quarter an acre. It has been opened to entry for twenty-five years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can not yield to the gentleman. The gentleman never said one word Friday or in his speech to-day about this being coal land. He said these were not farming lands. I do not know whether they are or not, but I do say that you are giving away these Indians' lands, held in trust by the Government; that you are giving them to a rubber concern at a dollar and a quarter an acre. The Government ought to go and mine this coal or allow some one to do so and use it with our Philippine vessels and service, or at least leave the right to sell open so that the Government can get full value for it when put upon the market—rubber plant, coal, and all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, so far as the question of coal is concerned, the gentleman from Tennessee need not get excited. He or any of his constituents can go there to-day and acquire this land, under our land laws, for a dollar and a quarter an acre, as they could have done for twenty-five years, or they can homestead it for nothing. That land has lain there all this time subject to entry and occupation, and there has been just one location in that vicinity.

The bill is guarded in every possible way against the alienation of any mineral rights, and the fullest opportunity of examination is accorded during the life of the lease.

It was not the intention of the framers of this bill, and it was not the intention of the committee, to sell one particle of mineral land. The gentleman from Tennessee has obtained certain information from the Geological Survey as to the mineral quality of the land, but I take issue with him on his conclusions. It is true that this tract is in the general mineral section of the State, but it is also true that there are at present no mineral developments there whatever, nor is there any reason to apprehend any in the future. It is not, as I am advised, mineral in any commercial sense whatever, and the statements made with reference to obtaining valuable mineral deposits in this manner are utterly without reason or basis of fact.

Now, so far as this antitrust amendment is concerned, you might just as well incorporate into this bill any other provision that the laws should not be violated. We did object to the incorporation of this amendment, and I think that it was very reasonable that we should do so. It is a restraint upon alienation that the gentleman seeks to engraft upon the bill, but it is more than that; it is a declaration in a piece of national legislation that certain laws already existing shall not be violated. In a civil bill it assumes that some one is going to do an illegal or criminal act and then adds a forfeiture to the other penalties prescribed for the unlawful conduct. You might just as well incorporate provisions that any other laws of the United States should not be violated as that the trust laws should not be. They will not be violated, and if they are, the courts are open to afford a remedy. There is no reason and no excuse for such legislation. Every possible safeguard has been thrown around this bill. Not one single suggestion was made by any Department to which the bill was referred, which suggestion has not been substantially incorporated in the bill.

Now, one word as to the rental. It is fixed at a minimum of 3 cents an acre per annum. The State of Colorado owns a large amount of land which to-day it is renting at from 2½ to 5 cents an acre, according to its value and location, the use to which it is to be put, and the requirements of the lease in other particulars, and I call attention to the fact that this is not a maximum, it is a minimum rental. The Secretary of the Interior can charge what he thinks is reasonable for the rental of that land, not less than 3 cents an acre.

I think the bill should pass. It can injure no one and it may make possible the development of a great source of national wealth. If these experiments which these gentleman propose to make, entirely at their own expense, are successful they will render productive hundreds of thousands of acres of land otherwise almost worthless, they will add vastly to the prosperity and comfort of very many settlers in many States, but what is more, they will make us, in some measure, independent of foreign sources of supply for a most important staple of commerce. No argument has been presented which should for a moment weigh against these considerations.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram from one of the largest manufacturers of rubber goods in New England and an ex-Member of this body, asking me to ascertain, if possible, who is back of this bill.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY] to answer that question. I want to say that not one citizen of Colorado has any interest in this matter other than the interest that we all have in the development of our State.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to tell the gentleman from Massachusetts the names of all the persons who are interested in this corporation. The president is Mr. J. L. Hudson, of Detroit, Mich., one of the leading merchants of that State and a very prominent Democrat and splendid citizen. The vice-president is Mr. H. P. Williams. The secretary and treasurer is Mr. Bethune Duffield. The other directors are Mr. Charles P. Kotcher, a lumber merchant; Mr. M. Sullivan, whose business I do not know; Mr. A. Y. Malcomson, a coal merchant, and the others interested are Mr. E. C. Dunbar, who is manager of the company; Mr. Jacob Farrand, a prominent manufacturer; Mr. Hugh McMillan, a very prominent manufacturer and a brother of the late Senator James McMillan; Mr. William R. Kales, Mr. Joseph Boyer, Mr. Emil Wenger, Mr. Walter Russel, Mr. Robert Thuner, Mr. David C. Whitney, and Major McCall. Every one of these men is of the highest possible standing in the city of Detroit and State of Michigan. There is absolutely nothing intended beyond the exact purpose of the bill as it appears upon its face. Nothing else is dreamt of by any member of the company.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is exciting some solicitude among the rubber manufacturers of the country, or I should not have received this telegram.

HUDSON, MASS., 16.

Congressman CHARLES Q. TIRRELL, Washington, D. C.:

Mail me copy of bill relating to leasing land in Colorado to P. F. U. Rubber Company. Who is back of this bill? See Speaker prevents hasty action.

L. D. ASHLEY.

Mr. Ashley only a few years since was a Member of this body. I know nothing about the bill, either for it or against it. I only bring this matter to the attention of the House to show that is is exciting solicitude among the rubber manufacturers of the country, and therefore should be fully and carefully explained to demonstrate that they can not be injured by its passage.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill as modified by unanimous consent pass?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee) there were—ayes 112, noes 13.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ALASKAN DELEGATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 956) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska, with House amendments disagreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for on the part of the Senate.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. BRICK, Mr. POWERS, and Mr. LLOYD.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we now have two hours of general debate, one-half of which time is to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago startling information reached the people of the United States that a collision occurred between the military forces of the Government in the island of Jolo, in the archipelago of the Philippines, and a certain band or force of Moros. The startling feature of it naturally was the disparagement in the numbers of the slain and the further fact that it was said that women and children had been killed by the forces of the United States soldiers. With very imperfect information, gentlemen on this floor saw fit to savagely attack the Army of the United States and send forth to the country and to the world unstinted criticism reflecting upon the general in command, reflecting upon the officers in immediate command of the troops, and, by natural inference, reflecting upon the valor and integrity and good name of the American Army.

The President of the United States saw fit to send to Congress a message and in the same occasion transmit a copy of a letter which he himself had written to the Secretary of War commenting upon the character of the transaction, and we knew by the publication in the public press that the President had congratulated the troops in the field, with as full knowledge of all that had taken place as any one person has, and with possibly very greatly superior opportunity of knowledge. His letter or telegram of congratulation has been spread before the American people, so that the assault made upon the Army and the attack upon the good name of the American people on the floor of this House went as a rebuke to the President and the condemnation of the conduct of the Army over a direct compliment that the President had made; so that when gentlemen assail the Army they assail also the President of the United States. Now, the President can take care of himself.

However, I may say that the President of the United States has some knowledge of war, has some knowledge of what is due soldiers operating under these circumstances, has some patriotic regard and affection for good soldierly conduct and efficient soldierly behavior. While he is an admirer of gallantry and soldierly courage, he is at the same time imbued with a rare spirit of condemnation for anything cowardly, for any act of unnecessary brutality, and he would no more countenance or justify an act of unnecessary cruelty than he would do any other mean act. So when the President with, as I have said, a better knowledge than the public in general had of the circumstances, indorsed the conduct of our troops, it went a long way to satisfy the American people that no wrong had been inflicted.

I wish to speak a few words in defense of the soldiers of the Army who made that desperate battle. I wish to argue it fairly and present an answer to the criticism as far as possible, and I will read something which I consider a fair synopsis of the ground of the complaint made on the other side.

The attack on the commanding general and the troops taking part in the action at Mount Dajo, in the island of Jolo, has been based on the following causes:

First, the large number of casualties of the enemy; second, the fact that women and children were among the killed; third, that no prisoners were taken, and fourth, as to the method of attack.

With reference to the large number of casualties, it is to be observed that of the troops operating in the attack eighteen were killed and fifty-two wounded, a total of seventy, which is presumably more than 10 per cent of those engaged, which would indicate that the engagement was not wholly one sided. That was especially so when we consider that the arms of the American troops were necessarily superior to those of the Moros. The fact that there were among the killed women and children has been very clearly explained in the telegram from General Wood, and it is not known a village could be attacked or a camp in which women and children were mixed indiscriminately without some women and children being, as a matter of fact, killed. As to the statement that no prisoners were taken, this seems to be wholly gratuitous and untrue, and while the number of such prisoners has not been officially reported, the only inference that can be drawn from the statement of General Wood's report of the number killed, who himself had ordered the succor of the wounded among the natives, is that this statement is without any basis whatever of truth. As to the casualties among the Moros, the official report states that there were about 600. This, of course, is not an exaggeration or an excessive number of killed where the action lasted several days against that number of troops, and the fight terminated in a hand-to-hand charge, as appears to have been the case at the crest of Mount Dajo. Every precedent, and especially every precedent in the history of the Moros, shows very clearly that had the action been to the same extent reversed no American soldier would have lived to tell the tale.

Now, it is but fair to suppose that when the full facts are known it will be found that quite a number of prisoners were taken and a great many wounded cared for in the hospitals and by the medical officers of the Army, and that among these prisoners will be a great number of women and children. As to the method of attack, it has been suggested that this mountain should have been surrounded. The gentleman from Virginia, who I believe is a farmer by profession, explicitly stated as a matter of military strategy that that mountain, which some of us have seen and which he himself had an opportunity to see, ought to have been surrounded by the troops. I am told that a cordon of troops to have successfully surrounded that mountain to prevent an incursion or excursion of Moros would have required a force of from eight to fifteen thousand men. That mountain is not a mere apex. It is a mountain miles in circumference, and therefore the whole story or whole idea that it ought to have been surrounded falls to the ground. In the first place, Moros never surrender. This gang of Moros, as I will show you as I go along, belong to a class of pirates, professional thieves, an organized band of murderers, who never surrender and fight until the last armed man of them is dead. Now, the gentleman seems to have thought this was a sudden outbreak, something that came just suddenly upon our troops, and they went right at it and murdered all of these inoffensive pirates, but the fact about it was that for more than a year this band of pirates have been occupying the crater of that mountain. For more than a year their expeditions of murder and robbery have been going on out from that stronghold, and all attempt to induce them to surrender long ago failed, and the alternative was presented to the commander of these troops or the governor of that island, or whoever put the military force into action, to allow them to continue in that stronghold, made strong by nature and made stronger by art, a place as strong against an assault of infantry as Gibraltar is against an assault by artillery, to maintain that body of criminals, that body of murderers, that gang of representatives of a condition which I will show you has existed over a hundred years in this island of Jolo, or else go to work to do exactly what he did do. The thing had become intolerable. The matter had become a cause of murder of both men and women and robberies unparalleled, as I will show you, and there was no alternative but to get them out of that crater. There was only one way to get them out, and that was exactly the way that the skill of the American soldier, executing the command of his superior officer, succeeded in doing, and the President is absolutely right when he telegraphed, with full knowledge of all that had been going on there during all this period of time, that it was a significant and commendable feat of arms. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know the time is exceedingly precious here, and I do not wish to occupy it beyond reaching the particular purpose which I have in view. I ask unanimous consent at this point of my speech that I may put into the RECORD certain documents in connection with this phase of the existing body of pirates upon that particular island of the archipelago as illustrative of the whole condition that our troops found when they made the assault.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for the purpose stated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the particular character of these documents, from whom do they come, and when did he get them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They come from published statements. One is from Scribner's Magazine, "Inhabitants of the Philippines," by Frederick H. Sawyer, 1900, page 361.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman call that an official document?

Mr. GROSVENOR. These are official documents. They come to me from the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and they relate to the Philippines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are these all magazine articles?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That was an official report published in a magazine, and I have an extract from it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From whom was that official report?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is an official report, "Historia de Mindanao and Jolo," by P. Francesco Combes, and originally published in Madrid, Spain, in 1667, page 30.

Mr. WILLIAMS. 1667.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Extracts from the "Gems of the East," by A. Henry Savage, London, Harper Brothers, 1904, and official reports.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment, if the gentleman pleases. That is an extract from what?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, if the gentleman wants to object he can do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not I.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Every word of it will appear in this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only wanted to know the character of the official documents which the gentleman proposes to insert.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are official documents.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One of them is a Spanish book printed in 1600 and odd.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a part.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The other was published along in 1800 and odd.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The larger part of the documents come from the official reports of the Commission governing these islands within the last six months; and now I do not want to consume the time. If the gentleman wants to object, he can do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not object to their insertion, but I only wanted to know how ancient they were.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have here official reports touching all the connections heretofore reported: Scott on government of the islands, the report of Captain Cummings, of the Thirty-third Infantry; and I will point out to the gentleman the ancient and the modern history.

Mr. DALZELL. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if there is any doggerel poetry in it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; there is no doggerel poetry and nothing about works of art.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to have something about the people.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not relinquished the floor, and have nothing further to say upon that point. It is greatly to be regretted that gentlemen should have given out to the world and a charge be made upon the floor of Congress that involves the honor and integrity of the United States Army, and that has assailed the intelligence and wisdom of the President by inference necessarily, and planted a hostile feeling in the charge made. I will show you that this wonderful victory ought to have a vote of Congress rather than the implied censure of Congress. I believe that the leave to print has been granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The leave has been granted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, the first reference I desire to make is to the publication Historia de Mindanao and Jolo, and it is as follows:

[Extract from the new edition, published by W. E. Retana, Madrid, 1897, of the Historia de Mindanao and Jolo (p. 30), by P. Francisco Combes, originally published in Madrid in 1667.]

The history of the depredations of the Moros in our islands is much older than our domination. Their story is a tissue of the most atrocious insults, their episdoes the bloodiest scenes; they are the essence of perfidy and bad faith; all their pages are written in characters of blood. They have been the incessant scourge of our coasts, the most terrible plague of our towns, the greatest obstacle to our arms, and a great difficulty to the Government at all times. They have devastated the fields, fired the towns, profaned the temples, captured their ministers, wiped out towns and provinces; in a word, they have been a dam against which our armies and our glories have been dashed to pieces.

Here follows an extract from the valuable work The Inhabitants of the Philippines, to which reference has already been made:

[Extracts from The Inhabitants of the Philippines, by Frederic H. Sawyer. Scribners. 1900.]

Page 361: These terrible pirates, who have for centuries laid waste the coasts of the Philippines and the adjacent islands with fire and sword, carrying off tens of thousands of Christians or heathen into slavery, have only within the last few years had their power definitely broken by the naval and military forces of Spain and by the labors of the Jesuit missionaries amongst the heathen tribes of the island.

It is scarcely half a century since they annually attacked the Visayas Islands and even southern Luzon, and they have been, up to quite lately, the great obstacle to the civilization of the southern Philippines. In Cullion, Cuyos, and other islands the churches are built within a stone fort, in which the population took refuge when the Moros appeared. The old Spanish sailing men-of-war could not cope with these sea rovers, who in their light prahus, salisipanes, or vintas kept in shallow water or amongst reefs where these vessels could not reach them. Of course, if the pirates were surprised when crossing open water, they ran great risks, since their artillery was always very deficient, but they sailed in great numbers, and if it fell calm they would cluster round a solitary man-of-war and take her by boarding. In consequence, a special force was raised in the Philippines to protect the coast against these pests.

Page 364: It now falls to the United States to complete the task of centuries, to stretch out a protecting hand over to the Christian natives of Mindanao, and to suppress the last remains of a slave-raiding system as ruthless, as sanguinary, and as devastating as the annals of the world can show.

Speaking of the Moros, Mr. Sawyer says:

Absolutely indifferent to bloodshed or suffering, he will take the life of a slave or a stranger merely to try the keenness of a new weapon. He will set one of his sons, a mere boy, to kill some defenseless man merely to get his hand in at slaughter.[a] If for any reason he becomes disgusted with his luck or tired of life he will shave off his eyebrows, dress himself entirely in red, and taking the oath before his pandit, run amuck in some Christian settlement, killing man, woman, and child, till he is shot down by the enraged townsmen.

Wanton destruction is his delight. After plundering and burning some seacoast town in Visayas or Luzon they would take the trouble to cut down the fruit trees, destroy the crops and everything else that they could not carry away.

Yet, as they made annual raids, it would have appeared to be good policy to leave the dwellings, the fruit trees, and the crops, in order to tempt the natives to reoccupy the town and accumulate material for subsequent plundering.

Commonly very ignorant of his own religion, he is none the less a fanatic in its defense, and nourishes a traditional and fervent hatred against the Christian, whether European or native.

Looking upon work as a disgrace, his scheme of life is simple. It consists in making slaves of less warlike men to work for him and taking their best-looking girls for his concubines. His victims for centuries, when not engaged on a piratical cruise, have been the hill tribes of the island—the Subanos, the Tagacaolos, the Vilanes, the Manguangas, and others.

Originally immigrants from Borneo, from Celebes, or Ternate, with some Arab admixture, the Moros have for centuries filled their harems with the women of the hill tribes, and with Tagal and Visayas and even Spanish women, taken in their piratical excursions. They are now a very mixed race, but retain all their warlike characteristics.

Cut off from the sea by the Spanish naval forces, they turned with greater energy than ever to the plundering and enslaving of their neighbors, the hill men. These poor creatures, living in small groups, could offer but little resistance, and fell an easy prey. But now the devoted labors of the Jesuit missionaries began to bear fruit. They converted the hill men, and gathered them together in larger communities, better able to protect themselves, and although the Moros sometimes burnt whole towns and slew all who resisted, carrying off the women and children into slavery, yet, on the other hand, it often happened that, getting notice of their approach, the Jesuits assembled the fighting men of the several towns, and, being provided with a few firearms by the Government, they fell upon the Moros and utterly routed them, driving them back to their own territory with great loss. Of late years the Moros have found their slave raids involve more danger than they care to face, and even the powerful confederation of Lake Lanao was, till the Spanish-American war, hemmed in by chains of forts and by Christian towns.

But they have by no means entirely renounced their slave raiding, and, in order to give a specific instance of their behavior in recent years, I will mention that on the 31st of December, 1893, a party of 370 of them, under the Dato Ali, son of Dato Nua, accompanied by 7 other datos, all well armed, and 40 of them carrying muskets or rifles and plenty of ammunition, made an unprovoked and treacherous attack on Lepanto, a Christian village in the Montes country, near the confluence of the Kulaman River with the Pulangui, between the Lococsocan and the Salagalpon cataracts. This is the extreme southern settlement of the Jesuits, and the nearest missionary resided at Linabo, whilst the nearest garrison was at Bugcaon, some 4 leagues distant.

The inhabitants, not being provided with firearms, sought safety in flight, but the Moros captured 14 of them. They profaned the church, hacked to pieces the image of Our Saviour, and cut up a painting of Our Lady of the Rosary, smashed the altar, and with the débris lighted a bonfire in the middle of the church, which, strange to say, however, did not take fire.

They stole the cattle and horses, looted the village, and marched off with their spoil and the 14 captives.

When, however, they reached the ford on the River Mulita, five of the Christians refused to proceed into slavery. These were the Dato Mausalaya, another man named Masumbalan, and three women. They were all put to death by the Moros and barbarously mutilated. The flesh was cut from their bones, and it is said that the Moros consumed some of it, and so terrified the other captives that they marched forward into life-long slavery.

Mr. Sawyer, on page 380, says that—

Military operations on a considerable scale will be required there sooner or later against the Moros of Lake Lanao.

This would be a holy war, a war of humanity, and I would say to the Americans: Look back on the deeds of your forefathers, on days when your infant Navy covered itself with imperishable glory, when it curbed the insolence of the Bashaw of Tripoli, the Bey of Tunis, and the Dey of Algiers, teaching all Europe how to deal with Mediterranean pirates. Inspire yourselves with the spirit of Decatur and his hero comrades, whose gallant deeds at Tripoli earned Nelson's praise as being "the most bold and daring act of the age," and do not hesitate to break up this last community of ex-pirates and murderous slave hunters.

And then extracts from The Gems of the East, which have already been pointed out:

[Extract from The Gems of the East, by A. Henry Savage Landor. Harper & Bros. 1904.]

Fascinating as it is, Jolo (a Spanish corruption of Sulu) is much better known, and therefore less interesting to us, than its people. These folks are inaccurately called Moros. They call themselves—and we call them, too—by their real name, "Sug," or Sulus. They are nice people, with curious fanatical notions, such as most nice people possess in a greater or lesser degree, but circumstances have made them very treacherous, and innocent people frequently suffer from their fanatical outbursts.

The American military colony was in a commotion when we arrived. A soldier had been terribly gashed and killed by a juramentado. These juramentados, as the Spanish word expresses, are religious maniacs, who, after having undergone certain exorcisms in the mosque, proceed to kill any non-Mohammedan and then commit suicide, in order to obtain a happy existence in paradise. This makes it rather unpleasant for those who do not believe in the Koran, for one never knows when one of these devils may be about and treacherously hack one to pieces.

The Americans had given strict orders that no one should go outside the city without an escort. These juramentados, when they run amuck, show a good deal of grit, and I have known of one man actually attacking an entire troop of cavalry, while every soldier was firing at him. The heavy knives and kris of the Sulus inflict terrible wounds, and on one occasion in Jolo I saw a number of persons who had been killed by three of these fanatics. One had the left side of the skull cut as clean as with a razor, and the sword had also made a groove several inches deep in the shoulder. Another gash sideways had cut the body in two as far as the spine.

I had an opportunity of measuring three of these Juramentados—when they were dead—and they interested me greatly. As a type, they all three bore marked characteristics of criminal lunacy, and I firmly believe that the shereefs or priests select these weakminded fellows, who are murderously inclined, and play upon their credulity until they reduce them to a condition of wild frenzy and incite them to commit murder.

These men had square faces, very flat skulls, and low foreheads, cheek bones low down in the face and so prominent that when in profile they nearly hid the excessively flat noses; weak and small receding chins, and the square-fingered, stumpy, repulsive-looking hands typical of criminals—as cruel hands and heads as I have ever examined—the animal qualities being extraordinarily developed. Their repulsive appearance was also somewhat enhanced by the hair of the head being shaved clean and the mustache and eyelashes removed so as to leave a mere horizontal, tiny strip of black hair. The teeth had been freshly filed and stained black, the hair of the armpits pulled out, and the nails of the fingers and toes trimmed very short (pp. 169–170).

* * * * * * *

These fellows had entered the market place with their barongs hidden in bunches of fruit, as no Sulu is allowed to enter the place with his weapons. Once in the crowd they slashed about, killing several and wounding a number of the people (p. 171).

* * * * * * *

That matters were indeed coming to a crisis was unmistakable. Captain Marshall and I, with an escort of cavalry, made a reconnoissance in the more troublesome villages, to which the assassins belonged, on the day of the murders, and the sulkiness of the natives we met was apparent. They would not answer the greetings of the soldiers, did not reply to our questions, had their spears nicely polished and ready for fight in front of their dwellings, and, as we approached, all, with no exception, held their hands on their vicious-looking barongs or krises, read to strike on the slightest provocation, or even without (p. 172).

[Extracts from The Philippine Islands and Their People, by Dean C. Worcester. The Macmillan Company. New York, 1898.]

Mr. Worcester, after speaking of General Arola's precautions to prevent armed Moros out of Jolo, says:

"These elaborate precautions were by no means unnecessary. Before they were put in force Juramentados had repeatedly made their way to the plaza and on one occasion had beheaded Spaniards as they sat in front of a café reading their home letters.

"During Arola's time only one of these mad fanatics managed to get within the walls. He fought his way through the guard, but not before he had been run through the body and shot several times. He fell dead 50 feet inside of the gate.

"'Accidents' sometimes occurred at the lanceria, however. One day a Moro, who had been in and out so often that the soldiers on duty knew him well, entered the town, leaving his barong as usual. Later he came out and claimed it, but before going his way handed around a package of cigarettes. Several of the men put down their guns to light up, giving him a chance for which he had doubtless long waited patiently. Quick as lightning he snatched his barong from its sheath, beheading one of the soldiers with a continuation of the same movement that drew the knife. The man's head rolled 15 feet away. Before the stupefied guardias recovered from their surprise two more of them had received fatal injuries, while a third was crippled for life, but the sergeant was too quick for the Moro and blew his head off" (pp. 188–189).

Now, I have translated from the History of the Mohammedan-Malay Piracy in Mindanao, Jolo, and Borneo, by Montero, printed in Madrid in 1888, the following:

PREFACE.

The history of the vandal incursions, of the terrible depredation, of the cruel assassination and horrible captivities brought about by the Malay-Mohammedans of Mindanao, Jolo, and Borneo, is written with blood in a thousand of the towns of the Philippine Archipelago. For more than three centuries savagery and civilization, the crescent and the cross, the standards of slavery and of the redeemers of slaves, have there sustained a tremendous struggle.

The god of war has established his realm in those beautiful islands, the sands of whose shores are brilliant with the rays of the sun, with the red reflections that are given them by the blood spilt in a hundred combats. Still resound in space the groans of the conquered blended with the cry of victory of the conquerors. Still the marks of the flames and the ashes of the buildings in many villages and towns, forts destroyed, cannons spiked, hulls of vessels floating in the seas and rivers, and the quietness reigning in places where formerly were inhabitants, show that the desolating scourge of war has punished those territories, forming a striking contrast with the magnificent beauty and natural brightness of sky, the exuberance of vegetation, and the warmth of the tropical sun which invites to life. To-day discord agitates the hearts of Joloanos and Mindanaoans, and their former strength appears exhausted; however, they still fight with savage fury for independence, a synonym with them of the most complete anarchy, of the maintenance of slavery, of the most cruel absolutism, of war, piracy, and extermination.

Spain has not yet been able in Jolo and Mindanao to fulfill the civilizing mission that she has realized in the remainder of the Philippine Archipelago. Her efforts, her sacrifices have been sterile; one time she has employed arms, at another made treaties and agreements, both of which have been failures of equal shamelessness. The pertinency, tenacity, and rebellion of the Malay Mohammedans have overturned nearly all the forces and have made inefficacious all possible measures. Neither whipping quiets them, misfortune softens them, nor victory satisfies them. War is their element, piracy their only occupation, slavery their wealth. They fight to make captives. The captives work the fields, row their boats, provide them with pearls, frequently at the cost of their lives, augment their power and influence according to their number, and are at all times merchandise of ready sale. For these reasons never have they ceased to be pirates. The Moro Malayans recognize no benefit, nor pardon injury, are cruel, revengeful, artful, traitorous, and liars. However many times, obliged by the force of arms, they have agreed to a treaty, so many times have they failed in the execution thereof, making ridiculous the good faith of the conqueror. The isles which they inhabit constituted from the first an exception to the admirable efforts which gave as a result the incorporation in Spain of the vast archipelago discovered by Magellan. The renowned Legaspi, at his death, left under the dominion of Spain the great island of Luzon, with the adjacent and important Visayan Islands, but not those to the south of the archipelago, inhabited by this warlike and fanatical race, skillful in the manipulation of arms, and habituated to robbery and piracy. The religion of Mohammed, spread among its inhabitants, has made impossible the ready triumph obtained by the missionaries over the other inhabitants of the archipelago, whose inhabitants were idolatrous, without distinct creeds or living in the most absolute religious indifference.

As early as 1569, one of the valiant captains that accompanied the Legaspi expedition—the Quartermaster Martin de Gioti—sustained a bold fight in the waters of Cebu against a little flotilla of Jolo and Borneo pirates. From this remote date, there has hardly passed a year that the Spanish-Filipino navy and army has failed to measure arms with the Malay-Mohammedans. This continuous struggle has resulted in a brilliant series of feats of arms worthy of the legendary epoch of the ancient states of Greece and Rome. The army and the navy have enriched the Spanish patriotic history with pages of glory that, once known, must serve for the admiration of future ages, and of stimulus to the present generation, resulting in the delivery of the country from the ominous Saracen yoke. * * * If the political wisdom of the governments of the Philippine Islands, if the resources of the treasury, and the social state of the country had kept pace with the valor of the sailors and soldiers, certainly to-day the Spanish flag would have waved over the north of Borneo, and neither in Jolo nor in Mindanao would the employment of armies have been necessary at the present time. The lack of a rational and constant plan and the effort to convert to Catholicism people so wedded to their beliefs as are the followers of Mahomet, in addition to the causes before enumerated, have maintained a situation in all respects violent to the Filipinos, consuming lives, wealth, and time, which, used in better employment, would have transformed the face of that magnificent country.

Spain has been prodigal with the blood of her sons and of the wealth of her treasury in overcoming, in civilizing, in repressing the ancient fury of that barbarian and bloodthirsty race, a curse on humanity and the executors of their brothers; Spain has struggled during three centuries for the high ideals, and in defense of her subjects, held by the Moro-Malayans in painful slavery, has fought the causes to create respect for her sovereignty, a hundred times recognized and as many times betrayed. * * * Don Modesto Lafuente, in his General History of Spain, page 28, says: "Extremely painful is it for the historian to occupy himself with entire centuries in which men hardly occupied themselves with other subjects than fighting. Readers and authors have to suffer that painful monotony, unless they pass without considering very long periods."

I produce extracts from a monograph prepared in 1901 by the Rev. Pio Pi, superior of the Jesuit Order in the Philippines, published in the Annual Report of the Commander of the Division of the Philippines for the year 1903:

A FEW MORO VICES.

In dealing with this race, refractory to all that is good, much may be said, and unfortunately all that can be said is bad. When we say that it is refractory to all good or to all civilization we must be understood as speaking of its present organization, with its sultans, datos, and panditas, because if on a chosen day all these "birds" of the archipelago should disappear the other Moros would obey the constituted authority and become as meek as lambs.

I will point out here a few facts that will serve to make known a few of their principal vices:

1. Gambling.—Perhaps there will not be wanting some who will wonder that we speak of gambling as a vice of the Moros, seeing that it is so general throughout the country; but though this be true the results of gambling among the Moros are especially worthy of attention.

The Moro datos, as a rule, spend their lives in gambling; and when they lack money for keeping up that occupation they sell the first thing that falls to hand, namely, the property of their vassals, of whose lives and property they are the absolute lords. Often have I heard complaints from Moros on this point, who had been robbed of their only carabao, and who were considered as having no right to reclaim or recover it, the actual possessor having purchased it from the dato; and it is looked upon as luck if they sold only the carabaos of their sacopes, for at times they would sell some individual of the family, as it happened in the case of Emilio Calumpit, lost at play by his dato in gambling, and who after several vicissitudes went to Tamontaca and became a Christian. The lately deceased Dato Galan, the most famous gambler and greatest mountebank of all the river, gambled away the daughter of his slave; and neither tears nor prayers were of any avail to cause him to desist from tearing her away from the arms of her mother and handing her out to the winner of the game.

What will civilization say to this?

2. Cruelty.—The Moro datos are notorious for their cruelty.

Uto, the once famous Uto, perhaps one of the most cruel men of these later days, gave at times his slaves and sacopes, even for insignificant shortcomings, unheard-of punishments, and other datos used to do the same thing, although less frequently. Those who escaped from him he punished by cutting the tendons below the knees, so that they would be unable to run and walk only with difficulty. Others he ordered to be bound in a place swarming with red ants, which are very vicious and whose bites are poisonous and insupportable. Others he caused to be bound naked to the trunks of trees and exposed by day to the burning rays of the sun and by night to the agonizing torments of the mosquitos, which infest and molest that part of the world. That an idea may be formed of this torment I will merely state that a calf was once purchased in Tumbas for the purpose of slaughter on the following day. The calf was left that night bound to the trunk of a tree, and on the following morning was found dead. Every one attributed its death to the cloud of mosquitos that passed that way. For my own part, I can say that one night in Tumbas I was seated in a canvas chair and was compelled to rise because the mosquitos penetrated with their "lancelas" not only the canvas, but even the habit and trousers. The men of the garrison of Reina Regente always put newspapers over the seats of their chairs, this being the only way to prevent the bites of the mosquitos. It happened once that Uto put some one in stocks, where he died slowly of hunger and misery, as the only food given him was some ears of corn, which were thrown to him every afternoon in the same manner as they would be thrown to swine, serving rather to prolong his martrydom than to nourish his body. Once a commander of a gunboat visited the house of Uto in Chapacan and came across a Moro there dead in the stocks. There he had ended his days, and they had not even removed the corpse.

Another of the punishments meted out by the datos is that of throwing those they wish to chastise into the river with their bodies encumbered with an immense stone, but in such a manner that when the tide rises to its maximum height the sufferer thus imprisoned has to stretch himself as much as he is able in order to prevent the water from entering his nostrils and mouth. Thus they leave the victims at times for weeks in the water, always exposed to death from drowning.

From the cruel Dato Andung, who ordered the death of Piang, there once escaped a slave who hastened to take refuge in Tamontaca; but unfortunately the dato heard of his flight shortly after his having set out in a banquita. Andung followed in pursuit and immediately upon coming up with him put him to death with a kris.

About the year 1885 a schooner under command of a Dutchman visited Cotabato. It appears that among other articles of commerce he carried arms. Believing doubtless he would be able to do business there he made his way to the dwelling of the Sultan. The result of his visit was that he was robbed of all he had in his vessel, which was scuttled and sunk; the crew were made captives, and the Dutchman was tied naked to a tree, while the surrounding Moros tested the edges of their krises upon his body, thus putting him to death by a slow, cruel process.

Guillermo Galmes (or Uring) at the time of the evacuation of Cotabato remained in Tamontaca, and one day having seen a banquita floating down the tide, he captured it. This fact became known to the Dato Diambungan, to whom the boat belonged, and he accused Galmes of theft, and for this supposed robbery imposed upon him a fine of ₱60. As the accused was unable to pay he was carried into captivity, together with his wife and four children. Later on P. Beunasar, S. J., went there and, aided by the governor, reclaimed the said family. The woman and children were given up, but the man had been killed in an attempt to escape.

One of the gentlemen who came with the American civil commission recorded that in Jolo he had seen a Moro who had always carried a large bandage to hide from public view his repugnant mouth, which was unsightly not from any natural defect, but because, having one day spoken disrespectfully to a dato, the chief ordered his mouth to be slit; and it was done with a kris, transversely, deepening it up to the articulation of the jawbone, the mouth in consequence remaining extraordinarily enlarged. The dato remained unmolested. According to his laws or customs he could do as he wished.

But are these customs compatible with civilization?

3. Haughtiness.—I do not think it would be an easy task to find a haughtier people than the Moro datos. As a rule they are a miserable set of people, but believe themselves Russian czars. Their pride is revealed in all their acts. In passing from one point to another they must always go under a palio—or, in other words, an umbrella—gaudily decorated, and surrounded by guards of honor armed with kris or campilan; and if they travel in their vintas the law commands that the drums and agungs must accompany them in their boats.

They are considered impeccable, and however great their faults may be they are not considered responsible for them. Dato Aco advanced this argument in the dispute which arose in the detachment of Tamontaca, in order to escape from being killed or bound. They did not know that although the dato is supposed to be irresponsible and invulnerable among the Moros he is not so among the Christians.

Once some Moros traveling in a banca with their dato asked for some cocoanuts from the deceased H. Vinolas; and, when the petition was refused, gave the reply, "He who asks is the dato." Vinolas still continued to refuse, and once again the Moros reminded him that it was the dato who wanted the cocoanuts. The Moros were dumfounded to see, contrary to their customs, that he denied the dato what he asked.

Uto was accustomed to mount his horse by putting his foot upon the shoulders of one of his servants, who bent down purposely to accommodate the magnate. The writer once saw the act performed in Bacat.

The Dato Mamon ordered the immediate death of one of his vassals who had made some irreverent gesture.

We have frequently seen presents made to some datos, and, although the said presents were of some value and things appreciated by them, they always received them with apparent indifference and as though they were of no importance. All this is a result of their haughtiness.

The wives of the datos likewise always travel under a palio and accompanied by their maids in waiting, who surround them chanting songs of a dirge-like nature, but which to them appear very agreeable music. At times also they mount their horse after the manner of the datos, using the shoulders of one of their slaves as a stepping block.

As the Moros are very fanatical and superstitious, they look upon their datos as almost supernatural beings, a belief to which the panditas contribute greatly with their trickery, and thus it may be explained that in spite of the cruelty with which they ordinarily treat their vassals there can scarcely be found a case where one of them has been found insubordinate or rebellious against his dato. The most they do is to attempt to escape, if an occasion offers, to some distant point.

Thus, haughty as they are, it is not strange that they should refuse to subject themselves to the rule of a civilized Government. They do not desire to be governed by anyone, nor do they wish to have any communication with civilized beings. It is sufficient to put a group of houses of Christian Indians close to a Moro settlement to see the latter little by little disappear. All the Moros who at the commencement of the occupation of Tamontaca lived around the neighborhood gradually disappeared. General Salcedo proposed the formation of a Moro village in Tucuran, but a few weeks after the occupation of that point by Spanish troops there was not a single Moro habitation remaining of those formerly existing there.

That the Moros do not desire to be governed by anyone is evidenced by the wars of Jolo, by that of Uto in 1889, and by those of Lanao in 1897 and 1898, not counting the many previous wars which Spain was constantly obliged to wage against the Moros. All the several races of the Philippines, one after the other, subjected themselves to the yoke of Spain and entered into the ways of civilization. And the Moros? As far as concerns later times, the only thing that has been accomplished with this race is what was done at Tamontaca, and well we know how it was obtained, by what means, and at what cost. And there not a single dato was baptized, not because they can not be converted, but because their organization and autonomy makes their evangelization exceedingly difficult.

4. Robbery.—Among the Moros there scarcely exists one who is not a ladrone. This is not strange to anyone who knows a little of the race, for the dato being the one who robs in the most barefaced manner, can it be expected that his vassals will not rob also? And let not the reader suppose that this vice is confined to datos only; it is the same with all. They do not commit the robbery themselves, but they have at their orders those who are expert and accustomed to the work. Once a Tiruraye, who knew perfectly well this tinglado, was explaining it to me and said: "Dato A has so many, etc." One of their maxims is that to rob another settlement, above all if there be any enmity between the inhabitants of the two, is no fault. Such actions are so general that they are the common practice of all. At the southern mouth of the Rio Grande there lived and still lives the Dato Ara, who, without any doubt, is the most reasonable and decent of all the people of the river, and in spite of this we are aware that among his carabaos there are some branded with a cross, mark of the mission of Tamontaca.

5. Treachery.—Of the history of the Moros it may be added that it is nothing more or less than a series of treacheries both in Spain and in our possessions, in Morocco and the Philippines, for when have the Moros been found faithful? They submit to reduction for convenience or because they are powerless to resist. Or, in other words, are faithful in keeping treaties as long as it suits them, or whilst they have not sufficient strength to free themselves therefrom.

It is within a year and a half ago that one Mariano Doz, who several times has been skipper of the vinta of P. Beunasar, in his voyages to Lebac found a good rice field in that part known as Linas, close by the River Tran. As he had good rice that was to yield a heavy crop, friends were not wanting to warn him not to trust the Moros, but he took no notice of these warnings. One day some Moros sent by Matabalan, dato of the River Tran, visited him and entered into a very interesting conversation with him on the seashore. According to the custom of the country they chewed the buyo together, but suddenly drawing their krises the Moros killed him. Immediately there appeared two more vintas which were near by, and whilst one took up a position at the point as a watchman the remaining Moros busied themselves in cutting the rice and carrying it to the dato.

About the year 1884 two Moros who had escaped from the clutches of Uto reached Tamontaca. Both received Christian instruction in preparation for baptism. One day in the market place of the same settlement an emissary of Uto entered into a friendly conversation with one of the two. Whilst chewing the buyo together the emissary of the magnate—sent, as was afterwards known, with that object in view—suddenly drew his kris and cut off the Christian's head. Without the possibility of his being captured, he escaped among the people, who were struck with amazement at the boldness of the deed.

A short time previous to the evacuation of Zamboanga by the Spanish troops several families of Tamontaca who had followed the fathers to that capital wished to return once again to the former settlement. For this purpose two or three large vintas were hired. P. Beunasar gave them letters of recommendation to the Datos Benito and Mamogueten, the former having always been high in praise of the Spaniards and the latter always a great friend of P. Juanmarti, from whom he had received so many favors. The former ordered the death of several of these people and the captivity of others with several women, although he afterwards freed them at the instance of Mandi. With the same end in view some others were also detained for a day and a night; and if he did not finally carry out his idea it was because of the threat of one of the prisoners that P. Beunasar would return to Cotabato in a gunboat.

Another case that may be cited in this connection to prove the treachery of the Moros is that of the treachery of Balabag.

6. Piracy.—The Moros are unexcelled pirates, and slavery constitutes perhaps their greatest wealth. It is well known that within the last quarter of a century formidable fleets of vintas sailed continually from Jolo and the Rio Grande, and after sacking some pueblos of the Visayas returned to their strongholds loaded down with booty and with captive Christians. Their hatred inspired them at times even to approach the walls of Manila. The then Bishop of Cebu, Señor Gimeno, did not desist from petitioning the Spanish Government to occupy southern Mindanao in order to put a stop to such piracy. He sent every year a record of the people of his diocese who had been captured by the Moros, and at times the number reached 2,000. At times whole pueblos were captured and the churches robbed of every object of any value they contained. At last the Rio Grande was occupied, and later on Jolo. Several faluas (small rowboats) were sent down, but they were so heavy that when they were rowed they scarcely moved, while the Moros in the vintas, which were generally very light and of but little draft, had the laugh on them.

Hence the faluas were useless to prevent piracy, but later on, when the gunboats came, the scene changed. The vintas met with on the high sea were overhauled and, if suspected, were searched, and if contraband was found aboard it was confiscated and the crew made prisoners. A great many were sunk, and in this manner in less than a year piracy was stamped out in the south. From that time on the Moros could no longer conduct their piratical expeditions to the Visayas or to other ports. But then they began stealing children among themselves. The Moros can not exist without their slaves, and when they can not have Christian ones they procure them from among their own race. Malabang and Baras have been for a long time the chief markets of human flesh, and to the said points were carried those captured in Lanao, to be sold to the Chinos of Cotabato or to the Moros of the Rio Grande. And there also was sold those captured in this last-named place, to be sold in turn to the Moros of Lanao. In this manner, to a great extent, escape from their masters was almost impossible, as they were far from their own settlement and in an unknown region. The immense majority of the children who entered the refuges established at Tamontaca were Malanaos, and it was an interesting thing to hear them recount the manner in which they had been captured.

From the time that the gunboats commenced to cross the seas of the south to a degree did piracy cease at sea. For the seventeen years I was on the Rio Grande I received notification of only three or four Christians being captured. But the practice was renewed after the evacuation by the Spanish, when a Filipino government was left in Cotabato. This was succeeded by the American Government, after the cataclysm of crime and violence with which we are well acquainted. But the American Government has done nothing up to the present to put down piracy, which has commenced once more to assume extraordinary proportions, its principal victims being the Tirurayes, the third part of whom have been carried away captive to Jolo and other points in two years. In this respect we have retrograded to the times of Corcuera (1639).

In concluding this subject, I will mention the following: Some time since, speaking with the American colonel at Zamboanga and with the commanding general of Cotabato, I told them that it appeared to me that the Moros went to Rio Grande and neighboring shores in Joloan pancos loaded with arms, which they sold at these places, and returned loaded down with Tirurayes. Although the said officers did not deny this, they doubted it, or believed at least that the tale was exaggerated. The following occurrence dispelled their doubts:

On the 29th of April the launch of Cotabato, which had come to Zamboanga three days before, returned, having as passengers myself and two American officers. A good distance before reaching Punta Flechas we discovered a white object on the larboard. We soon knew it to be a vinta. The captain of the launch remarked, "Surely that is a Joloan panco, and if it is going out that way they are certainly carrying arms, and if it comes thence it carries Tirurayes." In Spanish times this boat would have been examined. "Shall we examine it?" said the captain, as though defending his honor. No sooner said than done. It was in fact a Joloan panco, the crew of which seeing us bearing down upon it let down its sail and hoisted the American flag. However, the flag proved of no value to them. The captain boarded her with four marines and commenced his examination. In half a minute they discovered in the hold large quantities of cartridges, carbines of various classes, rifles—Remingtons—and a large case of cartridges and pistols. The panco was taken in tow and, together with its crew carried to Cotabato, where the captain and crew were thrown into prison.

Our task is done. It will be a happy day when the Government of the United States becomes convinced of the existence of the obstacle to civilization we have here denounced and of the possibility and necessity of removing it for the common welfare of the country.

PIO PI, S. J.

MANILA, P. I., July 25, 1901.

I present certain official reports from our own officers of recent date—Maj. H. L. Scott, for instance, governor of the island, and other officers, all making official reports to their Government. Major Scott was most treacherously trapped into an ambush and chopped almost to pieces by a Moro pretending to be friendly.

[Extract from report of Capt. S. A. Cloman, Twenty-third Infantry, dated Bongao, P. I., February 2, 1900.]

I have the honor to report the following as having taken place in the Tawi-tawi group of islands, within my jurisdiction:

On January 26, 1900, a party of soldiers, consisting of Sergt. Egbert V. De Wolfe, Corpl. Leonard T. Mygatt, Privates Webster F. Gibbons, William T. Carter, and John A. Greathouse, all of Company H, Twenty-third Infantry, left the post in a small sailboat, on a seven days' pass, for the purpose of visiting the lake on the island of Tawi-tawi and hunting.

The aforesaid party left the post about 8 a. m. Friday, January 26, 1900, and proceeded up the coast of Tawi-tawi about 12 miles, where they camped on the beach for the night.

* * * * * * *

The party next went into camp on a samll uninhabited island about 8 miles from Balimbing, and about 6 o'clock that evening saw two large proas (native boats) about a mile offshore, where they remained all night. This caused no particular remark, as proas are continually coming and going in those waters, many people living entirely in their boats. Early the next morning these proas landed and the natives, 10 in number, came to camp. Several of them were recognized as being of the inhabitants of Balimbing, who had treated them so nicely, so every effort was made to return the hospitality. They were given breakfast and a deck of cards that they seemed to greatly fancy. About 7 a. m. the party broke camp and proceeded over the main island of Tawi-tawi, although the natives seemed to insist on their staying where they were until high tide in the afternoon.

* * * * * * *

At this time Corporal Mygatt was taking off his clothes in a corner of the tent, while the other four men were playing whist on a blanket in the center, being surrounded by the natives, who seemed greatly intent on grasping the methods of the game. They had no weapons with them except their woodcutter's tools, consisting of native hatchet and parangs (a sort of bolo used for cutting small timber), but none of these were visible at the time. The corporal left the tent and went to the beach and soon afterwards heard some screams and two shots. In the tent the game had continued for about five minutes after the corporal's departure, when the native standing behind Sergeant De Wolfe suddenly pulled a parang from behind him and struck the sergeant on the neck, nearly severing the head from the body and killing him at once. At almost the same time Private Gibbons was struck on the side of the neck and head, making a hole through the skull 5 inches long, through which the brain oozed, and Private Greathouse was struck on the neck, the parang severing the external carotid artery and exposing the internal artery and spine. The parang (barong), which I now have, is badly nicked and dulled, or the head would have been completely severed. The edge of the parang meant for Private Carter's neck was turned by the tent canvas and only staggered him, but at almost the same time another Moro struck him a terrible blow on the head with an oar he had made. He staggered toward his gun but another native sunk a hatchet deep in his back, injuring his spine. He then ran to the cook fire about 20 yards distant for the ax, but by the time he had reached it and turned, the Moros had all disappeared but the three who were chopping Private Gibbons, and these ran before he could reach them. In the meantime Private Gibbons had reached his gun and fired a shot, but being virtually blind and staggering, it was without effect, and then began a terrible struggle for the gun. Private Gibbons could do little more than struggle bare-handed for its possession, while the three natives literally chopped him until he was helpless, when one of them got possession of the gun and shot him below the heart. The natives then ran for their boats and pushed off, taking with them three rifles, one revolver, and four belts, with the cartridges. This whole mêlée lasted only about a minute, being simply a wild chopping and scramble for the guns. When the corporal returned from the beach he met Private Greathouse in the woods, carrying a gun with one hand and holding his head on straight with the other. * * * The dead sergeant and Private Gibbons had to be carried through the woods to the boat, and they were over 30 miles from friends or help, with one man to sail the boat and take care of the three wounded. * * *

THE JURAMENTADO.

The Moros are accustomed to suffer all the caprices of their despotic authority. The laws of centuries permit the men to be recruited for any purpose whatsoever. The debtor who can not pay becomes, with his family, the slave of the creditor, and the Moros are so indifferent to these conditions that their owners do not encounter any difficulty in making them contract such debts for their own resources. The debtor thus loses all his rights, and his children can be sold throughout the archipelago. He can, however, buy the liberty of his family at the risk of his own life, i. e., for the largest number of Christians whom he can slay. If the debtor accepts this proposition, he becomes that moment a Juramentado, knowing perfectly well that if he manages to get into the midst of a Spanish settlement that all hope for escape is dead. Death is therefore certain for all Juramentados, and it is never the case that one repents his imprudence, because there are a number of Juramentados assembled to submit themselves to certain rites performed by expert panditas or priests. Along in the deserted forest, the moonlight adding its rays to the weird, fantastic scene, they commence their exercises by fasting, reciting, and praying over the graves of the departed Juramentados and speaking of the bliss and happiness that is to be theirs in the heaven of Mohammed.

When they arrive at a sufficient state of exaltation, but never before, they are sent into a Christian community. As this is a ceremony that interests more or less different families, and a great number of formalities have to be gone through with, it can never be kept absolutely secret, no matter how much it would be to their interest to do so, and thus it is that the governor of Jolo receives notice that an attack by the Juramentados will be made. But they can never inform him of the exact time when the attack will be made, because the Juramentados themselves do not know at what time they will reach the exalted state. At nightfall, in the magic splendor of the moon, reverberates in the depth of the forest warlike sounding metal, like the everlasting lamenting echo of ever wandering souls. The priest congregates all fame-thirsting youths; speaks of the strong ones who died a noble death in front of the enemy's steel, of the menacing shadows of creditors, of the glory of the hero, and the infamy and slavery for the coward, and of other inexhaustible lives of pleasure where brilliant eyes look upon infinite treasures; and as imagination crazes them they convulsively grasp their sharp kris (sword) and imagine themselves feeling the cold sweat of death on their foreheads. From the damp vapors of the night surge voices, instilling valor into their hearts. The following day they die at an outpost.

The first Juramentados of whom we have knowledge, through history or tradition, gave themeselves to martyrdom through exaltation of belief. Exalted in their practice of prayer, fasting, and making abstractions of all terrestrial pleasures, anxious to gain the paradise offered to all believers of Mohammed, they prepare themselves for the sacrifice, imposing upon themselves material mortification, putting strong binding upon their members and resolve to die on the terminal day. They shave their heads carefully, clothe themselves in clean white clothing (color for mourning among the islanders), and accompanied by their relatives, after arriving at the spot of bloody purification, they take leave from their relatives and present themselves before the largest possible body of armed Christians, calling their attention, provoking them, in search of death and martyrdom. The merit of eternal recompense is to receive cruel blows without a murmur or lament, without a show of agony, or avoidance of suffering, until expiring they lie victims of their own ignorance.

These mystic martyrs followed the warriors and were not satisfied in dying, but anxious to kill, mixing religious fanaticism with political fervor, never retreating, showing themselves to their enemies and trying to cause the death of the largest number before falling. Their open attacks were followed by ambuscades and surprises, any means seeming proper to gain their martyrdom. The odium of races, the desire to distinguish themselves before their families, the wish to be revenged, and many other causes to-day make the Juramentado. Abuse, scorn, or any injury will make assassins of Moros and will convert the greatest coward into a ferocious beast. Take a Moro who has been your friend and force him to leave you and he will make you take a kris and kill him, because he will never allow himself to be so dishonored. Tragedies of all kinds among the Moros are credited to the Juramentado. Modern arms have, however, diminished these devils in human form, and only the bravest and most fanatical commit themselves for this purpose. There are few panditas to be found who will prepare candidates for martyrdom, as their respect for authority cools their religious ardor.

JURAMENTADOS.

October 30, 1902.—Two Moros ran amuck at the stables and cut one enlisted man of Troop H, Fifteenth Cavalry. The Moros were killed by the soldiers.

March 8, 1903.—A Moro ran amuck in the cockpit at Tulei, killing one Filipino man and wounding one Moro, one Filipino, and one Chino. One of the vigilantes killed this man.

March 10, 1903.—A Moro ran amuck at Tando Point, near Jolo, killing one private of the Engineer Corps. The run-amuck was killed by the guard at that place.

March 14, 1903.—Three Moros ran amuck at the market, near the pumping station at Asturias. They killed one Indian, two Moros, and wounded one Moro woman and one Filipino man. The run-amucks were killed by Captain Eltinge and his troop.

September 25, 1903.—A Moro ran amuck in the town of Jolo, having entered through the band gate. One soldier was cut by him. One soldier was killed by stray bullet fired by soldiers. The run-amuck was killed by the soldiers.

H. L. SCOTT,
Major, Fourteenth Cavalry, Governor.

A careful study of the material here presented will give to our friends on the other side, who are so anxious for the safety and happiness of these thieves and pirates, some information in regard to the sort of people they are agonizing about. Here, it may well be said, is a body of professional criminals, organized for murder, organized for larceny, piracy, crime in every form, and having no pretense of a government, outlaws absolutely, intrenched in a mountain pass where great skill had made what was believed to be an impregnable fortress, and after patiently waiting for more than a year, after all negotiations had failed and when it became absolutely certain that nothing but extreme force would dislodge this band of thieves and murderers, the gallant men of the United States Army marched up to the crater, and after three or four days of constant battle they succeeded in destroying the force. Will it be said that any more force was used than necessary? I deny it. Is it to be said that there should have been gentler means? I point out that gentler means would have been unavailing.

So I conclude that the necessity to dislodge these bandits was imperative; that all appeals for a cessation of murder and arson and robbery had failed of effect. It became the duty of General Wood and his officers to suppress these outrages with force enough to accomplish the result, and they were not to imperil the lives of their own men to an extent beyond the absolute necessities. It seems to have been skillfully done, successfully done, and when the report is finally made it is not to be believed that there was any considerable number of women and children sacrificed. If there were, then let the fault fall upon the men who made it impossible to destroy this nest of vipers without the incidentals that were required.

Strangely enough, just when this attack is resounding through the Halls of the United States Congress the information received shows that the Sultan of Sulu and his principal datos are still congratulating General Wood on the killing of the outlaws which has made possible the tilling of the fields. So at one end of the line we find that the authorities, such as they are, the Sultan of Sulu, with his officers and men, under the direction of the leading datos, formed in columns and carried water to the troops. It is said that this attack was delayed for six months while Governor Scott was endeavoring to persuade the outlaws to surrender, but the defiant attitude of the leaders of the outlaws made it absolutely impossible to hope for success except by the methods which were ultimately used.

The blood-curdling accounts of the killing of women and children that came from Manila from the sensational newspaper men over there are being constantly contradicted by the latest information, and yet the American people are told by Congressmen and the world is being told by Congressmen that the American Army has been guilty of butchery and unnecessary destruction of life and that the President has indorsed it.

Mr. Chairman, it is most unfortunate that there is such a tendency to make capital against the good name of the American people and the American Army whenever these outbreaks occur.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that I catch some of the usual phrases of jingoism in the statement of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has charge of the floor.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the understanding was that the gentleman from New York should control fifteen minutes and that I should have the same time. If that is agreeable to the gentleman from New York, I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I catch the phrases "wonderful victory," and "desperate battle," and "charges against the honor and integrity of the American Army." It is a wonder that something was not said about "treason to the flag" while the gentleman was going on, and then the old song would have been too familiar to require a reply even. The gentleman says we made a charge on the floor against the integrity and honor of the American Army. Why, the charge that has excited the interest of the American people was not made on the floor. It was made at Mount Dajo, and this "wonderful victory" and this "desperate battle" involved the loss of eighteen of our men. That is the whole thing reduced down to prose. The gentleman objects to treating the matter poetically. Prosaically treated, then, it is reduced to the loss of 18 killed on one side and on the other side the loss of 600 people, part of whom were women and children. These are the bare facts.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest——

Mr. WILLIAMS. These are the bare facts. One moment, and then I shall yield, but not in the middle of a sentence. The other bare fact, as the gentleman himself confesses it, is that thus far no prisoners have been "officially reported." I will add, no Moro wounded, either.

He undertakes unofficially to report that there will be found after a while to have been prisoners. I do not know whether that will be found or not. Thus far, at any rate, the men whose duty it was to report casualties at that battle report so many of the enemy killed—to wit, 600—none wounded and no prisoners. Not only none wounded, but no prisoners, in the official report. They account in the first place for the fact that women and children were killed by the assertion of General Wood that those people "made shields out of their children" and charged bravely, with their children as shields, upon the serried ranks of the American infantry. We are told that they were "robbers." I do not know, but if it be a fact that they were robbers, they were devoting to the profession of robbery a degree of immolation of themselves and of their families that no band of mere robbers ever devoted to such a cause. They immolated themselves, if Brigadier-General Wood's statement be correct. Mere robbers, with no higher aim than robbery, do not take their children in their arms as shields and charge upon the best armed and best disciplined troops in the world, and die—men, women, and children. But that is the way it was accounted for. Now, later on, I see it is accounted for in a different way. It is said that such women and children as were killed were killed by long-range shell firing. If that be true, of course, that could not have been helped. I understand that when you are shelling a place you can not choose just where your shell will fall, and if women and children are in the way, women and children suffer, as they did at Vicksburg, as they did at Saragossa, as they did at Metz, as they have done in many other places in the history of the world. Which of the two explanations is going to be taken? Or, is it true that later on we will have still a third one? Perhaps when American sentiment demands it there will be prisoners reported and perhaps wounded reported. And if hereafter prisoners and wounded are to be reported, why were they not reported in the official report of the battle, giving the casualties on our side and the casualties on the other?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no doubt the gentleman does not desire to misrepresent things; but the official reports state that there were other troops engaged, but there was the Philippine Constabulary, and there were other casualties besides the eighteen referred to. The eighteen does not cover all the casualties.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What were the casualties among the constabulary?

Mr. GRAHAM. Quite a number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not "quite a number," or it would have struck me. It did not go into three figures, I know, or it would have struck me as "quite a number."

Mr. GRAHAM. At any rate, away ahead of the casualties among the United States troops, as you will find.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember about that, but I am talking about the losses among our soldiers; because, in answer to the suggestion of charging the American Army with dishonor in connection with this "desperate battle," I want to prove how "desperate" it was for our troops. Knowing the American soldier, as I think I do, and knowing the Philippine Constabulary as well as anybody—most of us know nothing about them—I dare say that their percentage of casualties was not any larger than the percentage of casualties among the American troops. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio desires to ask me a question, I shall be pleased to yield to him. I saw him on his feet.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to suggest to the gentleman that General Wood in his report, as I recollect, stated that prisoners had assaulted and murdered some of his American soldiers who were trying to relieve the injured.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, they were prisoners.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I remember that General Wood in his report said that when they went to relieve some of those who were wounded these wounded Moros undertook to stab the men who came to assist them, and I thought to myself when I read it that perhaps that accounted for the fact that there was no wounded reported and no prisoners taken. Perhaps the soldiers became perfectly infuriated at that and acted accordingly, and so all were killed. There were no prisoners and no wounded stated in that report. If there were wounded or prisoners, they ought to have been stated in the report, and if they are stated later on then the gentleman from Ohio himself will confess that if we have made any error about the battle, and if we have commented erroneously upon the fact that there were no wounded and no prisoners, it is not our fault, but the fault of the officer who did not completely report the battle as he ought to have done. The gentleman from Ohio is too old and too good a soldier to tell me that he ever knew of a battle during the civil war that reported casualties without reporting the prisoners, the wounded, and the missing, as well as the killed. In this case they reported but one thing about the enemy, so many killed, all who were reported as present, to wit, 600, and as it was known that a great many of them were women and children, the officer reporting was forced to confess that a great many of the killed were women and children, and then accounted for it on the shield theory.

Ah! Mr. Chairman, we are carrying "the white man's burden!" If there is anything I am devoted to over and above anything in the world, it is the development of my race in its integrity and blood purity. I think it is the greatest race on the surface of the earth, but it is never well to forget the adage "noblesse oblige," that nobility and superiority carry responsibility, and that in the Philippine Islands our "greatest race on the surface of the earth," and all that sort of thing, ought to remember its superiority, ought to remember its nobility, and ought to remember that with its superiority there is responsibility, and in proportion as the other side is weak, in proportion as it is barbarous, in proportion as it is ignorant, so much greater is the responsibility which we ought racially to recognize as we go along winning "glorious victories" after "desperate battles."

I do not know but that future history may show that the battle of Mount Dajo was not as first reported. If that history shall show it, then, of course, remarks made about it as just reported will be exactly in that far erroneous, and will be exactly in that far subjects of regret to those who have made the remarks. But we can not change our opinions upon the mere supposition, the mere prediction of the chief prophet of the Republican party that there, perhaps, "may be" prisoners, that there, perhaps, "may be" wounded to be reported later "officially," and now only unofficially suggested by him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries appropriations for the expenses of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Federal Government for the next fiscal year. It abolishes 308 places now provided for by law, carrying salaries aggregating $360,360.25. It creates 243 new places and appropriates salaries therefor aggregating $276,324. It reduces 64 salaries for positions now provided and appropriated for by law aggregating $8,400, and increases 104 salaries, the aggregate increase equaling $16,930. In a word, therefore, the net reduction, as will be seen from these figures, made by this bill on account of positions and salaries abolished and reduced is $76,506.25.

These facts and figures ought to convince this House that your Committee on Appropriations has not neglected its duty in respect to inquiring into the condition of the public service in the respective Departments of the Government, and also into the necessity for positions now existing or which the Departments ask to have created and the salaries which ought to be provided for for the positions thus created.

I listened with much interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] last Friday, when he presented to the House and to the country facts tending to show the marvelous increase in the salaries and in the number of positions during the last eight years.

From his statement it appears that from 1888 up to and including 1898 the average annual increase in salaries aggregates about $2,000,000, and that the average annual increase in salaries since that time has been about $11,000,000. While the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] did not seek to convey to the House the impression that the Committee on Appropriations was responsible for these increases, both in salaries and in positions, I fear that his remarks may have left upon the minds of many Members the impression that such is the case.

I therefore desire, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to the fact that there are two principal causes for these increases. One is the creation of the Department of Commerce, with an aggregate expenditure for salaries for the fiscal year 1905 of $2,142,739.84. The other is the establishment of the rural free-delivery service, increasing salaries annually to the extent of $20,480,000. Both of these causes have occurred since the date mentioned by the gentleman from Maine. When you deduct the increases made necessary by these two facts, together with some increases demanded by laws enacted by Congress, you will find that the average increase in both positions and salaries since 1898 created and carried in the appropriation bills does not exceed to any material extent the average increase in both positions and salaries prior to that time.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is nevertheless a fact, one that is well known to every Member of this House who has had any extended service, that in the enactment of legislation by Congress there is altogether too little attention paid to the consequent increase in both salaries and positions for which appropriations must thereafter be made. It is Congress, therefore, and not the Committee on Appropriations that must assume responsibility for originating practically all the increases in the past, for when a law passed by Congress authorizes any of the Executive Departments to undertake a new work or to undertake a new investigation which involves a vast amount of labor and a large number of Government employees, there is thereby created a necessity for additional expense, additional positions and increases in salaries for which that Department will submit to Congress its estimates, and thereupon the Committee on Appropriations has no alternative except to report appropriations for the purpose of meeting this additional expense.

I am glad, sir, that, as I have heretofore said, the present appropriation bill is not open to this criticism. It is the first one I believe that the Committee on Appropriations has reported in about ten years which has not carried an aggregate increase in salaries and positions greater than the last preceding appropriation bill or the current law.

I was therefore very glad to observe the independent investigation and inquiry which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has given to the subject-matter of the appropriation bill now under consideration and to the subject-matter of the same bill reported and enacted in previous Congresses. If other Members would exercise their right and their privilege in a similar way, and devote time to the investigation and inquiry into the expenditure of public money and into the estimates submitted by the Departments, I feel confident that it would be of material benefit to the House and of great advantage to the Government and to the people. It would tend to prompt committees having jurisdiction of appropriation bills to be more careful in their investigation, more searching in their inquiries into the estimates submitted, and when their bills come before the House there would be less occasion and less justification for the superficial criticism which is so frequently indulged in upon this floor.

Mr. Chairman, I have realized for some time that the Federal Government was rapidly increasing its police supervision throughout the entire country. I have realized to some extent that we were rapidly assuming control and general supervision of the domestic affairs of the people of the States in the doing of that which belongs peculiarly to the States. But, sir, not until I came to examine the estimates of the several Departments of the Government for appropriations for the next fiscal year did I have any conception of the rapidity with which this extension of the Federal policing and Federal supervision of the domestic affairs of the people of the States was growing and being extended. For the purpose of ascertaining with some degree of certainty the extent to which the power of the Federal Government in this respect has been extended, I have ascertained from all the Executive Departments of the Government the growth of the inspection and general agents service during the past decade. I selected this branch of the public service for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the growth of the centralization of Federal power and the extent to which the Federal Government is engaging to-day in the work of doing that which belongs peculiarly to the States. I have done this because it is through that service that this power is exercised to a greater extent than through any other branch of the public service. In the statement I have prepared and will submit as a part of my remarks I have separated this service and given each branch of the inspection and special-agent service of each Department separately.

[a]Amount from which authority is given to employ agents, inspectors, etc.

An examination of this statement shows the total number of inspectors and special agents employed in the public service in 1896, the aggregate amount appropriated for that service, and also the aggregate number who were employed in that service in 1906 and the aggregate appropriations therefor. From this statement it will be observed that since 1896, or in the last decade, the number of special agents and experts in the Bureau of Labor has increased 100 per cent, and the amount expended for that service has likewise increased about 100 per cent. It will also be observed that the increase in the number of inspectors, examiners, and special agents of the Interior Department during the last decade has increased 79 per cent, and the amount of the expenditure for that service has increased 86 per cent, while we have increased the number of examiners, inspectors, etc., by the establishment of the Department of Commerce and Labor, in addition to the increases in the bureaus which were taken into that Department, to the extent of thirty-five.

The most notable increase, perhaps, will be found in the Department of Agriculture, where in 1896 they had only 160 inspectors, special agents, etc., and in 1906 they have 773. The total number of special agents and inspectors employed by the Government in the field and outside of the District of Columbia in 1896 was 931, while the total number in 1906 employed for that service is 3,113, an increase of 383 per cent. In 1896 we were expending for this special-agent and inspection service only $1,315,526, while to-day, ten years thereafter, we are appropriating $4,567,728.

As tending to show the character of the work done by the inspectors and special agents of the Department of Agriculture, I herewith submit and will publish as a part of my remarks a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, which gives the inspection and special-agent service of that Department in detail.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 23d ultimo, requesting me to inform the Committee on Appropriations as to the number of special agents and inspectors that were employed in the fiscal year of 1896 and the number for the fiscal year of 1906. I forward to you the inclosed statement. I have been somewhat delayed in making this statement because of the labor involved in ascertaining the duties, etc., of the different classes of special agents and inspectors which I send, in order that the committee might comprehend how these special agents and inspectors are employed.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Another remarkable fact which will be observed from this statement and which proves the rapid growth and extension of Federal control over the domestic affairs of the people of the States is the fact that although our revenue increased during the past decade 74 per cent the increase in the number of revenue agents, inspectors, and customs collectors and agents has been only 13 per cent and the amount appropriated for this service has increased only 22 per cent. The same small increase is true in all of the other Departments of the Government where this inspection service is employed legitimately for the benefit of the Government and for the purpose of collecting the revenue and protecting from fraud the interests of the Government when those interests require protection. The enormous increase in this service, as shown by this statement, is in those Departments of the Government which, under authority of law, have to deal with the affairs of the States or the people of the States, and much of this Federal service is rendered in conjunction with the States, or, as it is so commonly called, "Federal cooperation with the States," in the doing of that which belongs exclusively to the States. It must be borne in mind, too, that when a service of this kind is established or extended it at the same time involves a very large increase in the administrative force of the Department which is charged with the duty and responsibility of conducting the work or carrying on the service thus required.

I call attention to these facts, Mr. Chairman, in the hope of arresting the attention of Congress and the country to the marvelous growth during the past decade of a service which, if continued on the demand of the people as they have demanded in the past, will in the near future necessitate the expenditure of enormous sums from the Federal Treasury, pauperize the power of the States, obliterate the rights of the States, leaving the question only of State dependence or independence.

Mr. Chairman, we are directly responsible to the people for the money we are authorizing administrative officers to expend. It is theirs, not ours. These officers may justify their failure to comply with the law on the ground of sympathy, influence, or because of political pressure, but that excuse does not serve to relieve any Member of this House from his individual responsibility in respect to the appropriation of money for the public service or for any other purpose. The discharge of this duty demands labor, time, and thorough investigation into all the intricate and minute details of departmental administration. The Committee on Appropriations devoted five weeks to the investigation of this service and to a most careful inquiry into the estimates of the respective departments concerning their needs for the coming fiscal year. I am free to say, Mr. Chairman, not having had any previous experience on the Committee on Appropriations, and like most Members, having paid less attention to the subject than perhaps I ought to have done, that I was amazed at many of the disclosures revealed by that investigation. I do not insinuate or intimate that there is to-day or that there has been any corrupt practices on the part of any administrative officer of the Government; but I was surprised to find that the heads of the administrative departments of the Government pay so little attention to the details of the service in their respective Departments. I realize that they all have grave and enormous responsibilities in connection with the work of their Departments and the policies they must inaugurate and carry out, but at the same time the discretion necessarily vested in them by law is delegated to subordinate officers and clerks, who are not directly responsible to Congress, to a degree utterly inconsistent with good administration. The investigation shows that these heads of bureaus and chiefs of divisions, in almost every instance, are as susceptible to sympathy and influence as their superiors. The result is that when Congress says that a clerk, who is inefficient for any cause, shall be dismissed, the duty of reporting the fact of inefficiency has been delegated to the chief of the division in which that clerk is employed. Because of his intimate relation to the clerk or because of favoritism that chief is not as apt to enforce the law as he would be if it were practical for the departmental head himself to ascertain the question of efficiency or inefficiency. Hence we are told that one reason why this provision of law is not enforced is the fact, first, that they have not ordinarily the heart to turn these old people out, and, second, if they had, they are not reported to them as being inefficient, and therefore the evidence is not before them which requires them to do so.

In the Library of Congress the Librarian informed the committee that there was one man there over 70 years of age, totally, or almost totally, incapacitated for the discharge of his duties. When the Librarian was asked why he did not dismiss him he informed the committee that he could not. Well, why not—who is behind him? And immediately the answer came, "Chief Justice Taney." Further inquiry elicited the fact that out of respect for the memory of Chief Justice Taney, who appointed this man in the Library many years ago, the Supreme Court of the United States insists upon his retention.

The Secretary of the Interior cited several instances of a similar character. The Secretary of War informed the committee that it was practically impossible for any head of a Department to enforce that law, not alone because of his sympathy for the clerk who had arrived at that age when he or she was no longer capable of rendering efficient services, but also because of the pressure brought to bear by Members of Congress and Senators and other public officials in order to continue the employment of that particular clerk. This is not a condition, gentlemen, peculiar to this Administration. It is a condition that has obtained in all Administrations, and it will always obtain under our present system. It is for this reason that the Congress of the United States must enact an arbitrary law, whereby presumptive inefficiency resulting from age must be accepted as sufficient cause for separation from the public service.

In this investigation, Mr. Chairman, there are several matters of administration that the committees thought ought to be remedied. First let me call your attention to the fact disclosed in the hearings, that the Departments of Government are competing with one another for clerical service, a condition that has grown out of the increases in salaries of certain clerks in certain Departments doing identically the same character of work. One chief of a bureau, the Bureau of Standards, informed us that in the last two years it has been impossible for him to keep a stenographer and typewriter in his Bureau much more than six months. Why? He informed the committee that by the time the clerk had served six months, or a little more, he discovered that in the Treasury Department they were paying higher salaries for clerks doing identically the same work, and as soon as there was a vacancy in the Treasury Department he would ask for a transfer. The chief of that Bureau says he has not the heart to refuse to consent to his transfer when he is told the clerk can better his condition by transfer to the extent of from three to four hundred dollars a year.

This practice, Mr. Chairman, leads to a demoralization of the public service. The complaint is so universal on the part of the heads of Departments that your committee has deemed it necessary to report a provision prohibiting the transfer of clerks from one Department to another until the clerk has served in the Department from which he asks to be transferred at least three years. I am informed by the heads of Departments and bureau chiefs that from the standpoint of the public service this provision will be of great value. It will not only tend to produce greater contentment among the clerks, but will also tend toward an equalization of compensation for the same general character of work.

The other provision which has been reported, and which has been commented on more or less in the general debate and in the public press of this city, is the provision respecting superannuation in the Executive Departments and governmental establishments in the District of Columbia. That some legislation is necessary on this subject I think every Member of this House admits. It is a subject that has commanded more or less of attention on the part of Congress ever since I have been a Member of this body. Eleven or twelve years ago I became impressed, as other Members of Congress did, that our present system of getting into the service, with no means of getting out except by the voluntary act of the clerk or by the act of God, would ultimately lead to a condition of affairs that must break down efficiency and require the appropriation of many millions of dollars for the payment of salaries unearned because of old age. To provide against this unfortunate condition in the public service I prepared and introduced in the Fifty-fourth Congress the first bill introduced on the subject of the retirement of Government employees. This bill proposed to deduct a certain percentage from the salaries of clerks and deposit the same in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the civil service retirement fund. It then provided for a compulsory and voluntary retirement, allowing to the retired clerk a certain percentage of the average salary received during his service. After working for two Congresses on this proposition and having extensive hearings, I abandoned it. I became convinced, as other Members of Congress did, that it was not practical. At least one-half of the clerks are unwilling that they should be taxed for the benefit of the aged clerks now in the service, while almost all the clerks object to be taxed as long as there is any prospect of their being retained in the service for life. I am further convinced, Mr. Chairman, that if adopted this plan will soon result in retirement with an indirect Government pension. It would not be long before all salaries would be increased to an amount equal if not in excess of the amount deducted and deposited to the credit of the civil service retirement fund. If, therefore, this plan is to be considered seriously, you may as well adopt a plan of retirement from the civil service with a Government pension paid from the Federal Treasury. Many of the clerks realize that superannuation in the public service is increasing at an enormous rate. They know that unless some measures are taken to relieve the public service from this burden the people will, in the interest of efficiency and economy, demand the enactment of legislation that will put a stop to it, and that then there will no longer be an opportunity for civil retirement and a civil pension paid either from their salaries or from the Treasury of the United States.

The clerks here in the city of Washington have an organization created for the exclusive purpose of bringing about the enactment of legislation creating civil-service retirement, with a civil pension to be paid from their salaries. Their plan contemplates the payment after retirement of from 50 to 75 per cent of the average salaries they received. With these facts before us, and with the growing inefficiency and with the increasing appropriations on account of superannuation in the public service, Congress is called upon at this time to take steps to relieve the situation. I do not intend to discuss the causes, Mr. Chairman, which have led up to this condition of affairs. They are so patent as not to need discussion to prove them. They are the logical result of our system of taking people into the service with no provision for taking them out when they are no longer capable of rendering efficient service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to get a little information. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], in his speech, spoke about the number of employees 65 years and upwards, on page 3806 of the RECORD, and then said, "It is almost the universal testimony of the superior officers that this great number of subordinate clerks makes necessary a much greater number of employees to perform the work." Now, I alluded to that in a general way the other day. Will the gentleman tell the House and the committee how many extra clerks, we will call it, have been employed as the result of the people who can not do the work and who have not done their work?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee specifically, for the reason that the committee did not have time to go into each subdivision of the several Departments where these aged clerks are now employed and ascertain to what extent their inefficiency, due to their age, necessitates an increased number of clerks. But I will state this, that upon investigation, and according to the report the President of the United States made to this House, there are to-day in the Executive Departments of the Government and Government establishments here in the District of Columbia 585 reported to be over 70 years of age. Now, I want to call attention right here to the marvelous increase in this number. Eleven years ago, when I first had became interested in this question, I inquired in the Treasury Department and found that there were seventy clerks in that Department over 70 years of age. To-day, according to the report of the President, eleven years thereafter, there are 174, an increase in superannuation in the Treasury Department alone of about 284 per cent. There are almost as many in the Department of the Interior.

Now, gentlemen, this marvelous increase in superannuation, whether due to the present civil-service law or due to the fact that many of these old people were appointed under the so-called "spoils system" and have since been covered into the classified service by Executive order, the fact remains that the public service and the Treasury is suffering from the effect of superannuation and that superannuation is rapidly increasing. It is also true that to-day in the District of Columbia there are 585 clerks who are 70 years of age, over 90 per cent of whom it is said are incompetent for the discharge of the duties of the positions which they occupy and for which they receive from the Government their annual compensation.

I would call the attention of the committee to another important fact. Of the people in these Departments who are 70 years of age and over, 76⅔ per cent are drawing salaries of from $1,000 up to $4,000 per annum. Only about 188 out of the 585 receive less than $1,000, and the average annual compensation these clerks over 70 years of age receive is $1,243.88. The salaries paid to the clerks who are 65 years of age and less than 69 average $1,235.95, or an average of $8 a year less than the compensation paid to the clerks over 70 years of age. This shows conclusively that these clerks who have grown old in the service and who as a rule with increasing age have grown steadily more inefficient are to-day occupying positions of the highest responsibility, positions demanding the highest degree of efficiency, and for which the Government is paying them the highest salary paid to any clerks in the service.

These facts should convince every man on this floor, as they will convince the people of this country, that the efficiency of the public service must necessarily diminish and continue to deteriorate, and to the extent that it does, we must either require those who are occupying the subordinate positions to do the work of these old clerks at a lower rate of compensation or employ more clerks at the higher rate of compensation in order to do the work the Government requires.

Now, how are you going to dispose of this question? Are you going to dispose of it in the interest of the clerks or in the interest of the public service and in the interest of the people we represent by allowing clerks, regardless of their efficiency, to remain in the service at will until death or by providing that after July 1, 1913, all clerks on reaching the age of 70 shall no longer continue in the service?

Ah, the newspapers of the city of Washington are full of comparisons between clerks and Members of Congress and Senators. They seek to prove the efficiency of clerks 65 years and over by contrast with the ages of Members of Congress and Senators. They tell us that the most efficient men in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States are the oldest, without stopping to inquire as to whether this is true or not. They forget that the Department clerk does not receive his appointment from the body of the people or from the States. They fail to mention the fact that the Department clerk has a life tenure of office, not a term of two or six years. They entirely ignore the fact that Members of Congress and Senators must every two years and every six years return to the people and the States, the sources from which they received their commissions, and have the question of their competency passed upon by a board that is not influenced by sympathy because of our age, our poverty, or the length of our service. The comparison, therefore, proves nothing; it is absolutely ridiculous. There is no parallel either between the service rendered or the manner of appointment or the duration of the term of service.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, did your committee consider the advisability of limiting the term of clerks to five years, and making them eligible to reappointment?

Mr. TAWNEY. We did not consider the tenure of office proposition, for the reason that it necessarily involves a great deal of legislation and would excite a great deal of opposition here and elsewhere. The committee, not having jurisdiction of matters of legislation, concluded to not go into the subject to the extent of so radical a change as that would be in our present system.

Mr. Chairman, the committee does not offer this plan as a perfect one, but the investigation disclosed a crying necessity for some legislation on the subject of superannuation; and inasmuch as there are only two propositions that have been suggested for the purpose of removing superannuation from the public service, and neither one of these two propositions are at all likely to be enacted into law, the committee felt that it was its duty, in presenting the facts to the House, also to present a practical remedy that would to a certain extent remove the evil complained of.

One of the propositions to which I have referred is the retirement of the Government clerk on a pension, to be paid either out of the clerk's salary or out of the Treasury. The second proposition is the limited tenure of office; and as between the two I have no hesitancy in saying that I am far more in favor of the limited tenure of office than I am of the plan of a civil pension or civil retirement. [Applause.] I do not for one moment believe that the American people would approve of a civil pension or a civil retirement that involves the payment of a pension, either direct or indirect, to the civil employees of the Government. [Applause.]

I want to say that when we talk about a civil retirement or civil pension it means a great deal more than the retirement of the 26,000 clerks here in the city of Washington. It means the retirement on a civil pension of 300,000 clerks now in the Government service. There are to-day, in round numbers, 300,000 clerks in the classified and in the unclassified service of the United States, receiving an annual compensation of $134,000,000. When you talk about a civil retirement with a civil pension, you must include all of the Government clerks. On the basis of the number in the Departments to-day who are over 70 years of age, there are now in the entire public service more than 20,000 clerks over 70 years of age. Under any plan of retirement that has been proposed we would start out with a civil pension roll of from twenty to twenty-five thousand people. Allowing them 60 per cent of their average salary for the ten years preceding the date of their retirement will give you some idea of what the result would be of our adopting a civil retirement policy with a civil pension.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition submitted by the committee is not, as it has been represented in the press of this city, a harsh proposition. It may in a few instances deprive people of employment who need the salary, but in almost every case they are unable to render the service. While we may properly feel more or less sympathy for the aged Government employee, we can not nor should we forget that in proportion to the number of people in the Government service here in Washington who are over 70 years of age we have as many people in our own Congressional districts who have passed the meridian of life and are now standing in the full glare of its setting sun, who have contributed to the salaries of these clerks during their entire service. As long as these people continue in the service our constituents, old and young, will continue to contribute to their salaries, although they are not able to give them an equivalent in return. Can we justify the appropriation of the people's money under such circumstances?

While we owe certain things to the Department clerk who may have served faithfully for many years in the Department, we also owe something to the people in our district who have not had large and munificent salaries paid with regularity for forty or fifty years, and who have been obliged to depend upon their own individual effort for their living, and who now, when they reach the ripe age of 70, are no more capable of contributing to the maintenance of the dead timber in the public service than the people who are in that service over the age of 70 may be able to maintain themselves at this time of life.

Mr. Chairman, the presumption universally recognized in the life of every human being is that, as a rule, after reaching a certain age our ability to perform manual labor or clerical service lessens as our age increases. Congress has recognized this with respect to the judiciary by providing for retirement at the age of 70. We have also recognized it in our pension laws by holding that when a man has reached the age of 62 he is conclusively presumed to be one-half disqualified for the performance of manual labor; that when he has reached the age of 68 he is three-quarters disqualified, and when he has reached the age of 70 he is totally disqualified.

The provision reported by the committee as a practical remedy for this increasing superannuation in the public service, is that the clerk who has reached the age of 65 and who is less than 68 shall not receive to exceed $1,400 a year; the clerk who is 68 and less than 70 shall not receive to exceed $1,200 a year; the clerk who has reached the age of 70 or over shall not receive to exceed $840 a year.

Then to prevent the possibility of a civil pension, or civil retirement with a pension, beginning July 1, 1913, no clerk shall be employed who has reached the age of 70 years or over. Postponing the time when clerks must be dropped on account of age to 1913 will retain in the service all the clerks now in the service 70 years and over for a term of seven years from July next, or practically the remainder of their lives. There is no cruelty in that. The clerks who are approaching the age of 70 will know that from this time on they must look forward to the time when they will no longer be retained in the service. Those that come into the service will know that the time will come, even if they remain and are faithful, when they no longer can draw their salaries, and the tendency will be to make them more provident than they would be with a life tenure of service. There is no hardship, therefore, in this proposition. It is fair and it is just. There is no injustice to the clerk and it is fair and just to the people of the United States, who are paying the salaries of the clerks.

If, in the judgment of Congress, there are Government employees who are drawing salaries for which they render no equivalent, it is our duty to dispense with their services or put an end to their salaries by separating them from the service. If the administrative officers fail to relieve the service of superannuation, whose duty is it to act in the premises? It is ours, and that duty should be performed first in the interest of the people we represent. Are we justified in virtually throwing away the sum of more than $2,000,000, the amount appropriated annually for clerks in the Departments who are over 65 years of age—clerks who, under the natural presumption, can not render and in fact are not rendering an equivalent to the Government, but stand to-day virtually in the relation of pensioners, and pensioned, too, at the highest salary which the Government pays for the highest efficiency it can secure? It is our duty, Mr. Chairman, to act on this proposition, and it is the hope that the matter may, when it is reached in this bill, be considered on its merits; and if Members of the House feel that it can be improved by offering amendments, let it be done. Let the amendments be considered and let the amendments be adopted if necessary. But what we ask is that the matter remain in the bill for consideration. If it does not meet the approval of the House on its merits, vote it out, but don't deprive the House of the opportunity to consider it by taking it out on a point of order.

It has been said that this provision will discriminate against certain classes, and in particular the old soldier in the Government service. There is no desire nor intention on the part of the committee or upon any Member of this House to do any class of the Government employees an injustice, and especially not the employee who has served his country during the civil war. We have not excepted this class for the reason that when you commence making exceptions in a provision of this kind, there is no telling where it will end. As a matter of fact, the separation from service under this provision will not take effect until 1913, or seven years from the 1st of next July.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman know about the number of soldiers and widows of soldiers who come within this number who have reached the age of 70 years and over in the District of Columbia?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not, Mr. Chairman; but the number is necessarily very small, for the reason that the total number 70 years of age and over in the Executive Departments here in Washington is but 585. Now, bear in mind that this age provision applies only to the Executive Departments and the Government establishments in the District of Columbia. I find upon investigation that outside of the District of Columbia the character of the service and the taxpayers take care of the matter of superannuation. The service demanded of the employee outside of the Executive Departments is of such a character that when a clerk becomes incapacitated by reason of age or from any other cause there is no sentimentality that continues him in the employment of the Government. The taxpayers are near by. This employee comes in contact with them daily, and if the Government employee is incapacitated or inefficient by reason of age or other physical disability his superior officer, responding to a public sentiment, gets rid of him. I repeat that outside of Washington there is no sentimentality that continues a clerk in the employ of the Government when he is no longer able to earn his salary. So that Members need not hesitate to support this provision on account of its affecting the employees outside of the District of Columbia. It is believed that of the aggregate number over 70 years of age not to exceed over 100 or 150 old soldiers will be affected by this, because, mark you, a great many of the old soldiers in the public service here are not to-day receiving to exceed $1,200 a year, and none will be disturbed who is receiving a less amount than $1,200 a year until 1913. Most of them are receiving from $840 to $900, the compensation of messengers.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. PRINCE. I made some inquiry on Saturday last, and I find that the number of veterans who would be reduced and affected by section 8 of the bill now under consideration would be 412, and the amount of money reduction $220,445.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman must bear in mind that he has included there the employees in the District of Columbia, who are not in the classified service, and are therefore not affected by this provision. He must remember another thing, that when he uses the word "veteran" it applies to a great many more than old soldiers. It applies to men who have served in the military and naval service of the United States, regardless of whether they served in the civil war or not. Our solicitude is not so much for those who have served in the military and naval service as for those who have served during the civil war, and it is the civil-war veterans that I and other Members of this House, including the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], are particularly concerned about. We have this strange anomaly in our statutes: The soldier who has served in the military and naval service of the United States and has been discharged because of the disabilities incurred in that service has a preference in the matter of appointment to civil positions, whereas the soldier who served in the civil war, who may have received a dozen wounds, and who continued in the service until his regiment was discharged, is not given any preference at all. Hence it is that there are more of the so-called "veterans" in the public service than many men think there are.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee further in discussing the general provisions of the bill. They have been fully stated and very ably presented by the gentleman in charge of the bill and by the minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], and that phase of it I leave to their presentation. But I want to again ask this House, in view of the rapid growth of superannuation, in view of its effect upon the public service, in view of the fact that we are appropriating to-day more than $2,000,000 annually for a class of employees whom it is admitted by the heads of all Departments are not rendering an equivalent in service for the money paid them, whether we can afford to strike out or refuse to consider a proposition which is intended, to some extent, at least, to remedy the evil which to-day exists. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman time as he desires.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Under section 8 of this bill persons in the classified service who are 65 years of age and under 68 years of age are to receive compensation at the rate of $1,400 a year; those who are 68 years of age and under 70 years of age are to receive a compensation at the rate of $1,200 a year, and those who are over 70 years of age are to receive not to exceed $840.

I want to know whether they are to be paid that and still continue to perform the same service that they have hitherto performed, and performed well; whether they are to continue at these prices to do the work that other clerks who take their places from which they are reduced and continue to do, as they have done in the past, as much service as others who get a higher rate?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the committee, that his question relates entirely to administration. If the administrative officer reduces the compensation paid to a clerk, he would necessarily reduce or diminish the work that the clerk must do in consequence of the reduced salary; or he continues the clerk at the same work at the reduced salary because he is not able to do as much of it as he would if a younger man. Now, further, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio in regard to the matter of men receiving less pay than the positions which they are filling demand, there is no question at all but what there is a great deal of that going on in the Departments to-day, and it is a subject that Congress should give careful attention to. The reclassification of our departmental service here in the District of Columbia is absolutely necessary, so that when a clerk is assigned to the discharge of the duties of a certain position that pays a certain salary he will not be required to perform the duties of a higher grade or of a lower grade because of inefficiency on the one hand or because of the whim of a bureau chief on the other.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will my colleague pardon me for a moment? His response was not gathered on this side of the House to the question of the gentleman from Ohio. I understand the question to be this: Under the clause of the bill as carried now, if a man were 70 years old and dropped down to $840 a year, and from this time if he should prove to be entirely worthless, it would not carry him through to 1913.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; we do not take from the administrative heads of the Departments any discretion which is now vested in them to dispense with the services of any clerk, efficient or inefficient.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Altogether?

Mr. TAWNEY. Entirely dispense with the services of any clerk who has proven himself to be inefficient. The matter of their retention in the public service or the question of their dismissal from the public service remains just where it is to-day—within the discretion of the head of the Department in which the clerk is employed.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me further? I want to ask what objection there is to saying that in the bill? I ask that question because I have asked the committee to allow these old people to be paid as much compensation as other younger clerks are paid, provided they perform as much labor of the same kind. I want to know what his explanation of that is—that is, why the old soldier shall do as much work as the young man and be paid perhaps only half as much?

Mr. TAWNEY. My explanation of that, Mr. Chairman, is simply this: That to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio puts this matter right back again to where we are to-day—within the discretion of the administrative officer to determine whether or not that man is as efficient to-day as he was twenty-five years ago, or as he was a week ago, and right here I want, if the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Adverting for one moment to the remark made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. When my colleague on the committee in charge of the bill was discussing this, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] suggested that the reason for his opposition to this provision is that because a man is able to earn $1,600 to-day it was absolutely absurd to say he was worth only $1,400 to-morrow. That suggestion seemed to carry for a moment great weight with the membership of this House. It illuminated the debate amazingly, and perhaps looked to some like a twenty-dollar gold piece, but when you analyze it, Mr. Chairman, it does not even resemble 30 cents. A man's efficiency to command a higher salary is not a matter of instantaneous growth. He becomes efficient by gradual progression in the service, and by the same reasoning he becomes inefficient by gradually losing the physical power and strength that once enabled him to grow more efficient. He may be receiving fourteen hundred dollars to-day, and to-morrow advanced to a sixteen-hundred-dollar position. Is it less logical to say that if he is receiving sixteen hundred dollars to-day he may, because of gradual increasing inefficiency, be worth only fourteen hundred to-morrow? The matter of payment or increase of salary is a matter that depends upon increasing efficiency, and the matter of reduction of salary results from increasing inefficiency, after the clerk has reached a certain standard, which, under the rule of life, a man does ordinarily at about the age of 65.

Mr. KEIFER. With the permission of the gentleman, I wish to keep to the text. I do not care to answer what somebody else suggested, that the clerk might have been working for less than he was worth when he was getting $1,400. That does not meet the question I am working upon.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and he might be receiving more than he was worth when he was paid $1,600.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; that is a question of relative salary; but does not the gentleman know that there are in some of the Departments of this Government now old men who some months ago were reduced from salaries of $1,600 and $1,800 and $2,000 to $1,000 or $1,200, who are continued at the same work they were at before because they are better for that work than anyone else in the Department?

Now, I have not been on the subcommittee and I have not read the testimony they have taken, but I would like to know where the testimony is that warrants the general statement that all of these old men are disqualified for the performance of the duty that they are required to perform. I am told that there are some men almost indispensable in the War Department who are nearly 80 years of age, and that if they were dropped out the Department could not get men without training them up to know all the things that these men know and to do their work as efficiently as they do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say in answer to the gentleman that the statement has never been made by me that all of these old clerks are inefficient.

Mr. KEIFER. That was your statement to-day.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not. I say that the presumption is that they are, but there are exceptions to the rule, I admit, like the friend of the gentleman from Ohio employed in the Pension Office. There are exceptions to the rule, but when you are legislating for a class are you going to base that legislation upon the exceptions, or are you obliged to be governed by the general rule? In this proposition we have simply followed the general rule in respect to the inefficiency resulting from old age.

Mr. KEIFER. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. One moment further, if the gentleman will permit me?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have testimony on this subject which I have not yet submitted to the House. I wish that every Member of the House might take these hearings and study them and become as familiar with this question and the facts as the committee is. On page 352 of the hearings, Mr. LITTAUER, in examining General Humphrey, said:

When your work gets behind, do you call on your clerks to work extra hours?

General HUMPHREY. Yes; there are some clerks that work extra hours all along. There are some clerks who are not able to work extra hours, or even the hours required, because of age.

Mr. LITTAUER. What recommendation have you made as to them?

General HUMPHREY. I have made none in writing, excepting in my annual report; but I have discussed it with my superior.

Mr. LITTAUER. Are they incapacitated otherwise than temporarily?—

That is the language of the law—

Are they incapacitated otherwise than temporarily?

General HUMPHREY. Yes, sir; there are men who are too old to do a full day's work.

Mr. LITTAUER. The law requires that you should make a recommendation.

Then Secretary Taft, the head of the Department, who was present, suggested to General Humphrey:

Are you required, General, to certify about the efficiency of your office?

Now, mark you, all that is required is the chief of the Bureau to certify to the efficiency of the men employed in that Bureau. But General Humphrey is not required by law to certify to Congress. It is an order from the head of the Department, and by that order the legal duty to certify to Congress has been delegated to the chief of the bureaus.

Secretary TAFT. Are you not required, General, to certify about the efficiency of your force?

General HUMPHREY. Yes; we send in that.

Secretary TAFT. You certify they are efficient?

General HUMPHREY. No; but the efficiency marks show relatively just how they stand.

Secretary TAFT. But the last time I saw that I remember there was one man, or one woman, who was said to be inefficient and I therewith ordered her discharged, but I did not see from that report but that everybody else was efficient. [Laughter.] What is the form of that efficiency report?

Then Mr. Scofield, chief clerk of the War Department, answers, giving an explanation why we do not receive the certification from the heads of the Departments as to inefficiency. He says:

Mr. SCOFIELD. What you have in mind, Mr. Secretary, is this: Every head of Department under the law is required to report to Congress every year in connection with the estimates whether or not there are any clerks in his Department below a fair standard of efficiency. The head of the Department makes this report, based upon the reports made to him by the chiefs of bureaus—

Mark you—makes this report—based upon the reports made to him by the chiefs of bureaus. With a single exception every chief last year reported that he had not any clerks below a fair standard of efficiency.

But General Humphrey himself testified that he had clerks in his Bureau who, because of age, are not even able to do a full day's work of any kind, and yet the efficiency reports show that there was not a single man below a fair standard of efficiency. Mr. Scofield continued:

One bureau chief reported a clerk below the standard, and the Secretary ordered that that one be dispensed with.

There are some 70 or 80 odd in the War Department who are over 70 years of age, and yet when the bureau chiefs come before the committees of this House and are asked concerning the efficiency of their force, they tell us that there are employed clerks who by reason of age are incapacitated for the performance of the duties of the positions they hold, but they are not reported in the estimates as inefficient. Why? Because the bureau chiefs, to whom this power has been delegated, are in daily contact with the clerks. They see these people daily in their declining years, and while they recognize their declining efficiency they, from sympathy or other cause, decline to report them to the head of the Department. Why, Mr. Chairman, I know in one bureau here where there are four vacancies in one division. These four vacancies have existed for more than six months. The division is overcrowded with work. The men who are in that division are working eight and sometimes ten hours a day. These vacancies are not filled. Why? Because the room in that division is more valuable to the division than the four men would be who are entitled to the promotion. That is no exaggeration, but the statement of an actual fact. How many more divisions there are where this same condition exists I do not know. One man, when asked if these old clerks, who are receiving $1,800 and $2,000, were efficient, replied: "Yes; in the doing of that which has been assigned them to do." "Are they assigned to do that which their positions require them to do?" "No; because they are not competent to do it."

Mr. Chairman, such instances as I have stated are very numerous, and they are not only demoralizing the public service, but are reducing the standard of efficiency in the public service far below what it should be. The question for us to determine is whether we are going to allow it to continue and to increase, as it has been the past decade, or whether we will attempt to legislate for the purpose of correcting the evil.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, to find out whether we understand each other: I understand the gentleman's statement now to be that there is some trouble in the matter of performing the duty by the chiefs of divisions and heads of Departments, and that that constitutes a good reason why the old men, regardless of their standard of efficiency, should be required to do the same work for much less than the under men?

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I made no such statement.

Mr. KEIFER. That they are obliged to undergo the test of efficiency or go out; but if they stay in, they must stay in with the penalty that for living so long on earth they ought to be required to do their work for much less than another man.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have in the public service in the Executive Department of the city of Washington a very expensive service, and that service demands of different men different qualifications; also in the matter of the amount of physical labor, and we have attempted to equalize the pay of clerks by creating classes. Class 1 receives a salary of $1,200 a year; clerks of class 2, a salary of $1,400 a year; clerks of class 3, a salary of $1,600 a year, and clerks of class 4, $1,800 a year. Now, then, if one of these aged clerks happens to be occupying a $1,800 position, and assuming that he is an exception to the rule and is reasonably efficient, when he reaches that age when, as a rule, men are not efficient, and he is obliged to accept the salary of $1,400, he would simply be reduced in the class as well as in the compensation, and receive the same compensation that other clerks receive who are working in class 3 or class 2, as the case might be.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman know of any case of that kind in cases of reduction?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know of many cases of reduction. Unfortunately the hearings disclosed very few cases of reduction in any Department because of inefficiency.

Mr. KEIFER. I was told that there was no inquiry into reductions made in the Pension Office. Does section 8 of the bill require the classification of the old men, or does it only require him to go on and do his work and prove himself equal to the high standard of a clerk and, because of his age, take less pay for it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer that by asking the gentleman another question. What would the gentleman do if he had charge or was at the head of a Department when called upon to administer this provision? Would he require a man receiving $1,800, discharging the duties of that position, to continue to discharge the duties of that position in the same degree for a salary that a man who receives only $1,400 had to perform?

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to answer that. I would not; but I know that that thing is done now; that men are reduced from $1,800 to $1,200 salary and required to perform the same duty that they did before.

Mr. LITTAUER. What was the character of the work done before?

Mr. KEIFER. Skilled labor of the highest kind.

Mr. LITTAUER. Upon what basis was the reduction made?

Mr. KEIFER. On the basis that they were old, and nothing more.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman has one isolated case.

Mr. KEIFER. No; I have plenty of them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can the gentleman find a reduction of that kind outside of one that was made for political purposes?

Mr. KEIFER. There was no politics in making it at all. What I want is that if this thing is to work as our distinguished chairman says it ought to they should say so in the law and not say in effect that these men, simply because they are old, are to continue to do the same work they did as long as they stay in the Departments and be paid very much less than others that are not nearly so efficient as they are. And further, I want to say that if they do not come up to the proper standard of efficiency I would drop them out entirely.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As shedding some light upon the inquiries of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], I want to read from the speech of Mr. LITTAUER:

Secretary Taft, Secretary Bonaparte, Secretary Root were all pronounced in their statements on this point. Secretary Hitchcock declared that if the old clerks could be eliminated from his bureaus he could get along with a force 25 per cent smaller.

Mr. TAWNEY. Secretary Hitchcock stated to the committee that the effect of this provision reducing the old clerk and clerks who had reached the age of 65 would immediately increase the efficiency of his Department 25 per cent, and that when the old clerks who had reached the age of 70 were entirely eliminated from his Department he could do the work of his Department with 25 per cent less clerks than he is now employing.

Now, there is another abuse growing out of this which nobody has called attention to, which is the fact that at some of the bureaus it is the practice when a man becomes inefficient by reason of age or other disability to furlough him indefinitely, but to furlough him with pay. If that is not a pension, I would like to know what is a pension.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman if that is not contrary to the law now?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the gentleman think that an official who permits it violates the law as it exists to-day?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have in the hearings a letter stating that an engraver in one of the Departments here 80 or 85 years of age has been furloughed for some time and is now furloughed, and, as I now recall it, is furloughed with pay.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman. In a case of that kind is it not clearly against the law and ought it not to be used as an illustration of this matter?

Mr. TAWNEY. No more than keeping men in the service who are inefficient for the discharge of their duties. That is a violation of law.

Mr. KEIFER. That is right.

Mr. TAWNEY. But it is a matter that appeals to the heart and not to the judgment of men. It is not to the discredit of a man that he has more of the milk of human kindness in his soul than he has conscientious regard for the obedience of the law and the discharge of his duty in this respect. It is a matter of humanity, and it may be that that is the fact in the case I referred to a few moments ago of a man being furloughed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman a few moments ago to state that under this proposition the clerks who were drawing, say, $1,800 a year would be reduced to $1,200, say, on account of age, and that that would mean that they would do a different class of work.

Mr. KEIFER. There is nothing of the kind in the law.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about what the gentleman from Minnesota said.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think if he is performing the duties of an $1,800 position, if he is doing that work—and he is the exception if he is—receiving $1,800, when he arrives at the age of 65 he would be reduced to a $1,400 position, and of course would be required to perform the duties incident to that position instead of the duties that he has previously been performing.

Mr. MANN. It was because I did not want the gentleman to take a position of that sort that I called his attention to the matter. It does not require any less physical or mental effort to do the work of a $1,400 clerk or a $600 clerk than it does of a $1,800 clerk, and if you propose to cut a man down because of his age and his physical decrepitude, you give him other work down below always.

Mr. KEIFER. Always.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one moment. If you do not do that, then you propose to continue him through life at $1,800 a year.

Mr. MANN. Why, no; I think the gentleman's position would be perfectly logical if he said continue him at the same class of work, but pay him a less amount, because he would do less work of that class that he is familiar with; do not put him down where he would have to do more physical work and get less pay.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman did not understand me. I said it was purely a matter of administration, for the head of the Department to determine whether or not he should be reduced or continued. There is nothing to prevent the head of a Department from reducing him to $1,400 if he sees fit to do so, or if he is not doing as much work in the $1,800 position as a man should do, then it is in the discretion of the head of the Department to make the change. I think that is infinitely better than it is to fix a hard-and-fast rule for the administrative officer to follow in respect to the reduction of these men in the matter of employment.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not say that in the law?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to the fact that classification under the law is classification as to compensation and not as to character of work that is to be performed at that compensation.

Mr. KEIFER. The work is just as hard in one as the other.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is to-day work done in the Departments by clerks receiving $1,200 that is just as hard and requires as much intelligence and industry as those receiving $1,800, and there is nothing in the law that prevents it. Its bearing on the reduction of salaries that would come under the law that we propose here would be the same as referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He would continue to do the same character of work he was best fitted to do, but be expected to do less than an active clerk not yet having reached the age of 65 who was receiving a compensation based upon the idea at least that he could perform an ordinary full day's work.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not, then, say in the law that he should be paid for the amount of work or in the proportion as he performs it?

Mr. LITTAUER. That would be a beautiful topic for administration.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question, if the gentleman will yield. The gentleman from Minnesota said one evil he sought to remedy by this bill was if a man was employed, for instance, as a stenographer in one of the Departments he was soon drawn away to another Department, where he did the same work, but received maybe $300 or $400 more pay. Now, has the committee made an endeavor to remedy that evil by fixing the same pay for similar work done in the different Departments?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that we have not. We have, however, put in a provision——

Mr. PERKINS. But does——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman if he will give me a moment's time. We have reported a provision prohibiting the transfer from one Department to another until the clerk has served for a period of three years in the Department from which he desired to be transferred.

Mr. PERKINS. That I understand.

Mr. TAWNEY. The effect of that, it is believed by the administrative officers, will have a tendency to reduce or equalize salaries and to make a uniform salary for the same character of work. My own idea is, if it has any effect at all, it will have nothing more than a tendency in that direction. What we ought to do, and what the committee would have done if it had the time and opportunity to do, would be to go through these Departments and thoroughly investigate them from top to bottom, and report a reclassification for the purpose of having a uniform salary for the same character of employment.

Mr. PERKINS. It seems to me that the committee ought to do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman from New York will readily see that that involves a vast amount of labor and a great deal more time than the committee can possibly give to the subject during a session of Congress. It is a matter, I will say further, that the committee contemplates taking up, and, if possible, creating a commission of its own members, or an outside commission under the direction of the members of the committee, to make a full investigation into the question of reclassification, with a view of establishing uniform salaries for the same character of work.

Mr. PERKINS. That will destroy the evil of transfers altogether.

Mr. TAWNEY. That will destroy the evil of transfers; I grant the gentleman's statement is true. Now, in this connection, that the House may see the necessity for reclassification, let me read from a letter received this morning from a clerk here in the Department. I assume he is a clerk, although he does not say so.

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1906.

MY DEAR SIR: I wish to call your attention to some misapprehension and unjust propositions advanced in the legislative bill as reported to the House and during the debate upon it.

I invite the attention of Members to this letter, showing the condition of things we have to deal with:

Complaints are made of the irregularities in salaries of employees in different Departments engaged upon similar work. Surely the members of the committee must know that in many cases an employee who may be designated on the rolls as "electrician," "stenographer," or "bookkeeper" does not perform such duties at all, while on the other hand many employees designated as "clerks" are, as a matter of fact, working as telephone and telegraph operators, electricians, bookkeepers, etc. For instance, when you cut the salary of "telephone operator," or as now designated "switchboard operator," to $720, you are only affecting the one or two who happen to be designated as such on the rolls, leaving those in most of the Departments lucky enough to appear on the rolls as "clerks," undisturbed at their salaries of $1,000 to $1,400, or perhaps more. Criticism is made because the chief telegrapher at the War Department is receiving $1,800, whereas at the White House and three or four other Departments similar places are filled by persons styled "clerks," at salaries from $1,400 to $2,000. These are given only as examples, as the same criticism applies in many instances to "electricians," "stenographers," "bookkeepers," etc. It is also noticeable that "laborers," at $660, and "messengers," at $840, are in four cases out of five doing the same kind of work.

Now, I have no doubt from the investigation made by the committee that this statement regarding the necessity of reclassification is absolutely correct; but as I said before, Mr. Chairman, it is not the thought of the committee to attempt to correct all of these abuses or accomplish all the needed reforms in our departmental administration at the present time. We intend to go as far as we possibly can. We have endeavored to level the salaries in the House here or establish a uniform salary for the doing of the same kind of work—that is, work requiring the same degree of ability and the same hours, and in some of the Departments we have, as this gentleman states here, established a uniform rate of compensation for telephone switchboard operators, and in doing that we still leave the salary a hundred per cent higher than is paid for like service by private telephone corporations.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understood you to say that there are exceptions, where a man that has reached this advanced age could and was performing the duties of that office. Did your committee, in a case of that kind, find some way by which he could receive the pay?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say to the gentleman that we did, and we found it absolutely impracticable for the reason that it could have been done by vesting in the heads of the Departments the discretion to determine whether this man is competent or is incompetent, and that he has heretofore failed to exercise that discretion in the interests of the Government.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. And you could not find any way to give him the benefit of his efficiency?

Mr. TAWNEY. We could not without arousing opposition that prevents our doing anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by order of the House for debate to close has arrived.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1302. An act granting an increase of pension to William A. Murray—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2540. An act granting an increase of pension to Benjamin S. Miller—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2973. An act granting an increase of pension to Minard Van Patten—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 563. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas Martin—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3566. An act granting an increase of pension to John Carpenter—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3284. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles B. Cox—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3817. An act granting an increase of pension to Margaret Lewis—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 1952. An act granting an increase of pension to Jesse Alderman—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3584. An act granting an increase of pension to Peter Quermbeck—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2067. An act granting an increase of pension to Benjamin W. Valentine—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3222. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry Golder—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 520. An act granting an increase of pension to William D. Johnson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4424. An act granting an increase of pension to Nettie E. Tolles—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1435. An act granting an increase of pension to L. T. Davis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3811. An act granting an increase of pension to Ephraim Winters—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1203. An act granting a pension to Albert B. Lawrence—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CATHARINE R. MITCHELL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 9216) granting an increase of pension to Catharine R. Mitchell, with a Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

GALON S. CLEVENGER.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I call up a conference report that is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey calls up a conference report, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with, and that the statement be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a penson to Galon S. Clevenger, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
GEO. R. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. J. MCCUMBER,
N. B. SCOTT,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

This bill originally passed the House with the provision that the claimant should be pensioned subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as provided by section 4720 of the Revised Statutes, United States, according to the degree of his disability, but was amended in the Senate so as to allow a rating of $20 per month.

The result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment at $20 per month, and your conferees recommend that the bill pass as it originally passed the House.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
GEO. R. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MICHALEK indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the cashier of the United States Assay Office at New York to $3,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALGER submitted an amendment relative to the retirement with the rank and pay of major-general of officers of the rank of brigadier-general having creditable civil war service and who have served for two years or more in that grade, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that no permanent Army hospital exceeding in cost $60,000 shall hereafter be erected unless by special authorization of Congress, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committtte on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for grading and macadamizing Girard street, South Brookland, between Twelfth street and Brentwood road NE., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment providing that in computing the length of service in the Army heretofore or hereafter rendered, paymasters in the Army shall be credited with time served as clerks in the civil service, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 12087) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I ask that the amendment be read and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The amendment was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Add on page 11, section 9, after the word "jurisdiction," "but no writ of injunction or interlocutory order shall be granted by any district or circuit court without first giving five days' notice to the adverse party or his attorney of the time and place of moving for the same, nor until petition and answer are filed and hearing thereon is had."

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CLAPP submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. TELLER, it was Ordered, That C. W. Sanborn be authorized to withdraw the affidavits on file with Senate bill 586, there having been no adverse report on the same.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, it was Ordered, That all papers in the files of the office of the Secretary of the Senate relating to the bill (S. 5162, Fifty-eighth Congress) for the relief of the next of kin of Christian Reimers, be withdrawn, there having been no adverse report on said bill.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it may be now read for the consideration of the amendments made by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Armament of fortifications," on page 4, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and ten" and insert "six hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 21, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the unexpended balance of $39,302.16 of the $40,000 appropriated by act of March 3, 1903, for cast-steel top carriages for 12-inch mortars, is hereby made available for the purposes above named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 7, to insert:

POWDER FACTORY.

For the erection and equipment of a powder factory, with its necessary communications and accessory structures, upon such reservation now or that may hereafter be under the control of the War Department as may be selected by the Secretary of War, $125,000.

Mr. PERKINS. At the request of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] I ask that this amendment proposed by the committee may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will go over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, under the head of "Fortifications in insular possessions," on page 8, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended at Subig Bay, Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to this amendment, which it seems to me ought not to pass.

I think that Subig Bay should not be specifically cut out from this appropriation. We have already expended something like two million and a quarter at Subig Bay. If we should leave the islands at any time, that is the naval station we should retain. If we remain in the islands, that is the naval station we ought to use.

You can not get a big ship within a mile of Cavite. You have got great depth of water at Subig Bay, sufficient to take our largest ships. It is a harbor easily defended. There are two channels, only one of which can be used, and there is an island in the middle. The whole opening is not more than a mile and a half or two miles wide. There is deep water inside. That is where the great dry dock which is being towed across the ocean is going.

To refuse to make fortifications there if, in the opinion of the Army and Navy, that is the proper place, seems to me to be most unwise. Subig Bay was first selected by the naval board. It was then submitted to the joint board of the Army and Navy, and met with their unanimous approval. We have spent, as I have said, a great deal of money there already. It is certain to be the naval station of the islands in any event, whether we hold them or whether we leave them. I think to refuse in this bill to allow any money to be spent there is a very great mistake.

This amendment was discussed fully in the House and overwhelmingly defeated. I think we ought to follow the advice of the naval and military board, and we ought not to limit them in the expenditure of this money in cutting out one particular place in the Philippine Islands, and that place the one which has been selected for a naval station and on which we have already expended a great deal of money.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I agree in part with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, and the only thing which causes me to doubt whatever the conclusion he reaches that Subig Bay is the proper place on which we should make an expenditure is the matter which he himself brought to the attention of the Senate some days ago, in which he disclosed the fact, a very important one, of the existence of certain small islands on the east coast, if I recollect correctly, where there are large coal measures. The immediate object of his then bringing that to the attention of the Senate was to authorize certain steps to be taken by the Government for the acquisition of the property. If I remember further correctly, the statement was made at the same time by the Senator that not only were there coal measures there, but a very fine harbor.

I quite agree with the suggestion that we, in any event, will retain and should retain, either immediately on the island of Luzon or in some other part of the Philippine Islands, what can be hereafter utilized as a coaling and naval station. The only question in my mind as to the propriety of designating Subig Bay now as the place is the one which has been raised by the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not desire to interrupt the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted if the Senator desires to interrupt me at this point.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to ask the Senator a question; I was merely going to make a statement——

Mr. BACON. Yes; I am perfectly willing the Senator should make it.

Mr. LODGE. A statement in regard to the island of Batan. The island of Batan lies on the extreme southeastern coast of Luzon, as the Senator is aware. It is a place easily accessible either to merchant ships or ships of war, coming from the United States or going to the United States. But it is not in a very accessible place for the Asiatic fleet, which necessarily spends its time on the coast of China and India. Wherever our naval station ought to be it ought to be upon the China Sea.

Moreover, Batan is far distant from any labor market. That is the objection to Subig Bay. The only argument in favor of Cavite is that it is nearer Manila, where labor can be secured. But Subig Bay is very near to Manila as compared with the island of Batan.

The island of Batan has the coal measures. It has a good harbor, as the Senator says. But after long consideration, Subig Bay was selected as the best place for our naval station, and there a large expenditure of money has already taken place. I think in any event that would be the naval station of the islands.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I quite agree in the estimate of Subig Bay, and prior to the suggestion to which I have alluded as having been made by the Senator from Massachusetts I never had any question in my mind as to the fact that Subig Bay is the proper locality for the expenditure of money in the making of fortifications with a view to a naval and coaling station.

From some little personal knowledge, I quite agree with what the Senator says as to the undesirability of Cavite. It is not only lacking in water, but there is no harbor there. Manila Bay is a body of water some 30 miles in diameter. It itself is not a harbor, but it is as large as a sea, and in times of storm it is tempestuous, and it is impossible for ships to find any safe anchorage there. The only harbor we have inside of Manila Bay at all is an artificial harbor, which was made by a sea wall at Manila, but it is utterly unadapted to the purposes of a naval and coaling station.

The objection which I would suggest to this paragraph is not that it proposes to cut out Subig Bay, but that it fails to designate with particularity where this money shall be spent. I would very much prefer not simply that the amendment should be cut out, but that there should be another amendment which should require that it should be spent at Subig Bay. As it is, even with that cut out, while Subig Bay will be eliminated, there is no limitation upon what other place may be selected and where money may be spent which may hereafter be of no benefit to us.

While of course it is not definitely formulated in our minds, the general consensus of opinion is that the time will come when our holdings in that country will probably be limited to such as may be necessary for our military and naval purposes; and I think the Senator from Massachusetts is correct that the agreement between the military and naval officials is that of all the places Subig Bay is the place. It is immediately north of the entrance to Manila Bay. It is on the China Sea, and within easy access of all the Chinese ports, and is in itself the best place by reason of its physical features, aside from its locality.

So, while I shall not myself offer any amendment, and I do not know what may be the reasons which have actuated the committee in offering this amendment, I would very much prefer to see not simply the amendment rejected, but another one put in the place of it which shall designate Subig Bay. I think it is to our interests to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to call attention to the fact that the clause as it came from the House did not oblige the War Department or fortifications board to spend the money at Subig Bay. It left it within their control to say where the money in the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines could be most judiciously spent. This amendment simply cuts out specifically the one place which it is agreed by all military and naval authorities is to be the great naval station, and upon which we have already expended a great deal of money, and which we must fortify sooner or later. If we do not do it in this bill, it will be done in the naval bill; and we ought not to tie their hands, as it seems to me, against this one place, which is the place of all others where money is to be spent for fortifications and for a naval station, if it is to be spent anywhere.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator, as he is on the subject, if he knows what amount has been spent at Cavite, or has there been any amount spent there in the way of fortifications?

Mr. LODGE. I am not aware that any amount of money has been spent at Cavite. The Senator stated the case in regard to Cavite perfectly. I can add nothing to it. And he has had the advantage of having been there.

Mr. BACON. Any money spent at Cavite is money lost, in my opinion.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is money lost; and the effect of this amendment would be to throw the expenditure at Cavite, if it went anywhere.

Mr. BACON. Cavite, as I endeavored to state before, is not only a place of shoal water—and there is no harbor there—but when the wind is from the direction of Manila—I do not know the points of the compass exactly—it is impossible for any ship to ride at anchor at Cavite on account of the rough sea.

Mr. PERKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from California yield to me for one moment?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. This matter of a naval station was a good deal discussed when we were in Paris. There were several naval officers and Army officers before us and men who were entirely familiar with the Philippine Archipelago, and a suggestion never was made of any place for a naval station except the point mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not believe there is any other place on the archipelago that is at all fit for a naval station except this point.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, your committee having this subject-matter under consideration desired in their recommendation to the Senate to do that which to them seemed to be most practicable. There are several reasons which induced them to amend the bill, providing that no part of this sum should be used in the fortification of Subig Bay.

This amendment is recommended not particularly because of prejudice against Subig Bay, for, as has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], we agree that that is a very desirable place; that it is a good harbor, being 30 miles in length and some 10 or 12 miles in diameter, with water varying from 10 to 15 fathoms. But the estimates made by the Department for the fortification of our insular possessions were greatly reduced. The estimates made by the Department amounted to $9,969,662.90. That was reduced quite 50 per cent. In this bill making an appropriation of nearly $600,000 for fortifications in Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, and Manila and Subig Bay, they have recommended that no part of this sum shall be expended in Subig Bay, for the reason that they believe there are not sufficient funds to make a showing of any value to the Government there.

They also took into consideration the fact that as to Cavite and the port of Manila, the islands of Corregidor and Cabello at the mouth of the harbor or bay of Manila are a natural fortification. There is scarcely another harbor outside of San Francisco and Sydney that has the natural advantages that the port of Manila has for fortification. Manila is a city of 220,000 people, with millions of dollars of property belonging to the Government, yes, tens of millions of dollars, and it is surely the part of wisdom for the Government to fortify the entrance to that port.

As to the harbor at Subig Bay, there is nothing now there. The Senator is mistaken as to the amount of money which has been expended. I want to read to him from the official report——

Mr. LODGE. The Dewey dry dock will be there.

Mr. PERKINS. The dock is not yet there.

Mr. LODGE. Well, we hope it will get there.

Mr. PERKINS. We all hope so. If it had been built in San Francisco it would have been there by this time. If it had been built at Mare Island, Cal., it would have been about 5,000 miles nearer to the Philippine Islands than it was when it left the Atlantic shore. We shall pay $25,000 in tolls for that dock and her towing vessels passing through the Suez Canal. If it had been built in California, the freight across the continent would not have amounted to nearly so much as you will pay for tolls through the Suez Canal. The money would have been paid out to our own workmen, and it would have been kept in our country, in accordance with the principles of the declaration which my friend from Massachusetts has so often made, and to which I most heartily subscribe—that we should keep our money at home and spend it amongst our own people. I hope, however, that the dry dock will reach the Philippine Islands in safety.

Mr. LODGE. But I beg to suggest to the Senator from California that there are American workmen on the Atlantic coast as well as on the Pacific coast.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but I am referring more particularly to the tolls we are paying the Frenchmen and the Englishmen, who own the Suez Canal, for going through it. Had the dock been built on the Pacific coast that money could have been spent in this country.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Where was that dry dock built?

Mr. PERKINS. At a port on the Atlantic coast—Sparrows Point, Md.

Mr. SPOONER. "The Atlantic coast" is very indefinite. I should like the Senator to tell me precisely where it was built.

Mr. PERKINS. I have just stated, though the Senator evidently did not hear me, that it was built at Sparrows Point.

Mr. SPOONER. Now I know.

Mr. PERKINS. It was built by the Maryland Steel Company at Sparrows Point, near Baltimore. Since the Senator from Massachusetts has referred to this matter, I want to give the distances to Manila by the Atlantic and Pacific routes:

| | Miles. |
|---|---|
| New York to Gibraltar | 3,215 |
| Gibraltar to Port Said | 1,920 |
| Suez to Aden | 1,310 |
| Aden to Colombo | 2,130 |
| Colombo to Singapore | 1,560 |
| Singapore to Manila | 1,380 |
| Total | 11,515 |

If that dock had gone directly through to Manila, it would have gone 11,515 miles; but it seems it stopped at the Canary Islands. I hope, however, it will finally reach its destination.

If the dry dock had been built at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, on the Pacific coast, the following would have been its course:

| | Miles. |
|---|---|
| San Francisco to Midway Islands | 2,770 |
| Midway to Guam | 2,302 |
| Guam to Manila | 1,506 |
| Total | 6,578 |

Thus it appears that the difference in favor of sending this dock across the Pacific would have been 4,937 miles.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems to be a pretty plain case, as the Senator puts it, that the public interest would have been much better subserved by the construction of that dock in California; and I ask why was it not constructed there?

Mr. PERKINS. If I had had my way, it would have been; but unfortunately my friend from Massachusetts had more influence than I.

Mr. LODGE. I did not even know where it was built.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator spoke of the dock.

Mr. LODGE. I asked the Senator where the dock was built, and he said it was built at Sparrows Point, near Baltimore. I merely suggested, in speaking of American labor, that there were American laborers on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. PERKINS. I spoke of the tolls for going through the Suez Canal.

Mr. LODGE. What bearing that has on Subig Bay I do not know.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator said the dry dock was to go to Subig Bay, as I understood.

Mr. LODGE. It is not yet there, but we hope it will be there.

Mr. FRYE. When is it supposed it will reach there?

Mr. PERKINS. I see it stated this morning that it is supposed it will reach there by Christmas. At the rate of progress it has been making I think it will be long after Christmas before it reaches there.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I only wanted to suggest that possibly because the dry dock was not built in California shipyards the Senator from California, in charge of the bill, is punishing Subig Bay.

Mr. PERKINS. On the contrary, if the dry dock was at Subig Bay, Mr. President, I think your committee would perhaps have been in favor of making an expenditure at Subig Bay.

I have said nothing in relation to the large sums required to pay for the coal which these vessels use in addition to the cost of towing the dock from a shipyard on the Atlantic coast. However, this is all parenthetical.

But suppose the dock reaches Subig Bay, there is nothing there; there is no naval station as yet, unless it be on paper.

Mr. LODGE. There has been something like a million dollars spent there already.

Mr. PERKINS. That is not enough for the foundation. I will read to the Senator from the official report——

Mr. LODGE. I have the official report also. They have begun the erection of a barracks.

Mr. PERKINS. When the dock reaches there, we have automobile torpedoes, we have submarine mines and submarine boats, and we can easily protect that dock with very much less expense than it would be to build fortifications for which we have had no particular plan as yet presented to us. When I was a boy in Maine, when I went with the lumbermen into the woods to get out timber, in the first place we cut down the trees, then ran the chalk line to see what it would square up, and then they would hew to the line. If you were building a fence or a house, you would first make a plan, so as to know what that fence or house was to be constructed of and what it would cost you before you expended any amount of money upon it. That is one of the principal reasons that influenced your committeee in making this report—that the Department has submitted no plan to your committee for the construction of fortifications at Subig Bay. In the report of the commanding general of the Philippine Islands, he says this:

> The division commander visited Olongapo and Subig during the year. No naval establishment of importance now exists or is being installed in Subig Bay that requires land defense. The fortification of this point should not be undertaken until Manila is well protected, for if this port is captured the Philippines are lost. The defense of Manila against a naval attack will be a very serious proposition, as the entrances are broad and the water deep and heavy batteries will be required with accessory means of defense. To the undersigned it seems manifest that Cavite, where is now property of considerable value to the Navy, is a very important strategic point for a naval base. Certainly this will be the most important naval arsenal in the Philippines until Olongapo is thoroughly fortified.

The report was made in 1903. I have here before me the report made by the commanding general of the Philippine division in 1904 and the report of General Corbin for 1905, and no mention is made in either of Subig Bay.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. If it will not inconvenience the Senator, I should like him to come back to Cavite and to Sparrows Point. It seems to me a very extraordinary proposition that this dock, which could have been constructed as well at Mare Island, 5,000 miles nearer to the destination to which it was to have been towed, should have been built on the Atlantic coast. I can not understand it.

Mr. PERKINS. It seems so to me, Mr. President, but I do not wish to reflect on our naval authorities.

Mr. SPOONER. Was there any issue made at the time upon the place where it should be built?

Mr. PERKINS. It was left in the discretion of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. I think it was done under their supervision.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon the suggestion—I do not know that it is correct or upon what it is based—I do not know what were the controlling reasons with the Department, but it is a fact that in the carrying of that great structure from this country to the Philippines, in going across the Pacific Ocean there would be very long reaches, thousands of miles, along which there would be no possible port of refuge in case of trouble. On the contrary, in going by the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and the Indian Ocean, around by way of Singapore, along almost the whole route there is no place where within less than a thousand miles a port of refuge could not be found. That, however, may not have operated to influence the decision of the Department.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be a good reason.

Mr. BACON. From here to Gibraltar is the longest reach they would have in making that journey, unless you consider the passage across the Indian Ocean, and along the Indian Ocean they are nearer to the coast of Arabia, the coast of India, going to Colombo, than the distance to any possible refuge that could be availed of in going across the Pacific.

Mr. PERKINS. I think, if my friend from Georgia will consult the atlas, he will find that from San Francisco to Hawaii, from Hawaii to the Midway Islands, from the Midway Islands to Guam, and from there to Manila, there are stopping places, and there will be only a few hundred miles difference between stopping places on that route and by the route which has been taken.

Mr. BACON. I will suggest to the Senator from California, that there is nothing at the Midway Islands which could possibly furnish any relief in time of trouble in such a case; there is nothing there, nothing but a coral reef. Up to the time when the cable was landed there, there was not an inhabitant upon those islands, nor is there any possible place where that great structure could find refuge in time of trouble.

Mr. PERKINS. That is very true.

Mr. BACON. If you leave out the 2,000 miles from San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands, and if you leave out the Midway Islands, practically there is no port or place of refuge between the Hawaiian Islands and Guam. How far from California is it?

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is correct in his statement; but there was no need of this dock starting off without carrying sufficient fuel, and the ships that accompany it, the colliers and tugs, should have sufficient coal to go direct from Cape Charles to Gibraltar; but they could have followed the great sailing circle by way of the Aleutian Islands, and have taken that route. But I have only incidentally referred to that.

I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the same Government officers in the Navy, who have been educated at the expense of the Government—and none are more capable and more thoroughly equipped than they are—those same officers would have superintended the construction of the dock on the Pacific coast who did so on the Atlantic coast. Therefore I see no reason, as the Senator says, why it should not have been constructed there. Certainly the reason given by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is not an answer.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator would not mind my asking a question not relating to the voyage of the dock, I would say the Senator is a distinguished and leading member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He has just told us that there is nothing at Olongapo; and yet last year he reported a bill containing these items:

> NAVAL STATION, OLONGAPO, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS: Repairs to existing buildings, $25,000; drainage canal, to complete, $25,000; water system, to extend, $20,000; roads and bridges, $5,000; sewer system, $15,000; tools for general use, $2,000; hoisting machinery, $4,000; rock crusher and appurtenances, $4,000; in all $100,000.

That is a paragraph in the last naval appropriation bill for the maintenance and prosecution of work at Olongapo, which the Senator from California says does not exist.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is correct in the statement that I am a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, although I am not, as he says, very distinguished. It is true that that committee reported in favor of the appropriations which he has read; but let me read to my friend from Massachusetts what the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department says in the report for 1905. This is his language:

> (b) Olongapo.—The progress of work at Olongapo has not been as satisfactory as was hoped. In a measure this is due to the great amount of preliminary work required to prepare the site for the proposed station, and to the fact that the appropriations have not been made in accordance with the natural sequence in which the work of building up should be undertaken. Careful estimates have been made of the manner in which money for the building up of Olongapo could be most economically and judicially expended. Since the land for the site has to be raised from 3 to 5 feet above its present level, the time required to establish a repair station at this place will be between six and seven years, and the estimated cost will be $4,000,000. This should establish a plant which would have a somewhat better output and better facilities than the present station at Cavite.

We made the appropriation, Mr. President. Here is the report of the chief of that Bureau, which I have just read. It is self-explanatory. We make appropriations for many purposes, but sometimes it is not deemed expedient by the officers who have the disbursement of the money to expend it.

Now, let me read what the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks says about Subig. I want to say in passing, Mr. President, that your committee have the same object in view that the Senator from Massachusetts has. We only want to do that which is for the best interests of the service and the best interests of the Navy Department.

Mr. LODGE. Now, let me ask the Senator at that point, does the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy ask to have Subig Bay prohibited from this expenditure?

Mr. PERKINS. They do not.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Board ask for it?

Mr. PERKINS. I have read the message of the President, which came to us——

Mr. LODGE. You have put in a prohibition on the expenditure of the money at Subig Bay. I am not asking that you should require the expenditure of money there, but only that you should leave to the proper persons charged with the duty to say where the money shall be spent. This is a prohibition against spending it in one place in the Philippines.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I admit I have every confidence in the judgment, skill, and ability of the Board of Fortifications and Ordnance. I have before me their report, which was submitted to us late in March, preceded by the President's message of March 6, in which the President advised Congress that he had appointed a board consisting of the officers named to revise the Endicott plan for fortifications. Now, I want to answer the Senator from Massachusetts. I am speaking for myself personally. I recall the argument he made when he presented the bill to the Senate a few weeks since and asked unanimous consent, which was granted, to have appropriated $50,000 to purchase a mining claim, a mining location in the island of Batan, and the Senate unanimously passed that appropriation bill. I think they did so because of the persuasive argument used by the Senator from Massachusetts, who, it will be remembered, dilated upon the great advantages of this great bay in the island of Batan, which is capable of holding a whole naval fleet. He stated that there were great coal deposits on the island and that it was a Government reservation. I have looked it up on the map this morning—and have the atlas before me—to find just where the island of Batan is.

Mr. LODGE. The island of Batan is on the southeastern coast of the Philippines.

Mr. PERKINS. It is on the eastern side of the archipelago. It is only 500 miles from Manila. It is within 50 miles of the Straits of San Bernardino, which straits are the gateway to the Philippine Islands from San Francisco.

Mr. LODGE. How far is Subig Bay from Manila?

Mr. PERKINS. Seventy miles. Batan Bay would be just as near, under certain conditions, as Subig Bay, for if there was a fleet lying off there with torpedos or a coast-defense vessel it would be impossible for a navy to come out and engage them without meeting with defeat.

San Diego, on the Pacific coast, is nearly 500 miles from San Francisco; yet we think it is only a pleasure trip to go down to San Diego. It is a pleasure trip; and the trip from Manila to Batan in the Philippine Islands might be equally delightful.

The hydrographic officer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, whom I have interviewed, reports that Batan Island is a most excellent port of refuge. It has a splendid harbor, with 17 fathoms of water, and a ship drawing 42 feet of water can lie now within 100 yards of the shore. It is a Government reservation, and now wholly belongs to our Government.

As the Senator from Massachusetts was portraying the great natural advantages of this island from a nautical standpoint, the thought suggested itself to me what an ideal place for a naval rendezvous; what an ideal place for a naval station! The report of the Philippine Commissioners shows that the coal of this island has been worked for a number of years. The Government has been developing it, and if the extent of the deposit turns out as promised, a supply may be expected from the half of the island open to commercial companies that is estimated at 200,000 tons a year for the next two hundred years.

Mr. President, a battle ship without coal or liquid fuel is as helpless as a sailing ship at sea without wind. At Subig Bay there is no coal. There is plenty of water there, I notice by the report, although our estimates show that it will be necessary to sink wells for fresh water.

From the report of the committee of naval officers ordered to examine it I observe that 25.725 inches of rain fell in the month of June; 52.246 in the month of July; 37.765 in the month of August, and 27.678 in the month of September. In those months there was certainly a deluge of rain which would have washed everything away.

So your committee thought, in considering this matter, that no injury could be done to the Government or to the port of Subig to expend this money upon the islands of Corregidor and Cabello at the entrance to Manila Bay. Believing so, we have made this recommendation, and I want to reiterate that we have no object in view except to do in an advisory sense what we believe the best interests of the Government require.

In making these appropriations we must consider the available fund we have at our disposal. We have cut down these estimates 50 per cent, and we believe to spread them over 70 miles from Manila Bay would not be advisable; that it would not be in the interest of economy or in the interest of the fortification of Subig Bay.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. In connection with what the Senator is saying, let me call his attention to an item on the same page. I see that this bill carries about $5,000,000. The House bill carries a little over $4,000,000. The Senate has increased the amount nearly a million dollars—seven hundred and some odd thousand dollars. In going through the bill I notice on page 8 that $1,452,000 of this $5,000,000 is to be used in our insular possessions for the purpose of coast defenses, etc. I also notice on page 8, line 12, the following item:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense for the insular possessions, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $565,000.

The House of Representatives thought that $200,000 was a sufficient sum for that purpose. I have read the report of the House committee, and it is very difficult for me to understand how a House committee can say that only $200,000 was necessary for this purpose and for the Senate committee to say that $565,000 was necessary for the same work. To say the least, the Senate committee ought to be able to give the Senate some reason why this appropriation is more than double the amount carried in the House bill. I want to call the Senator's special attention to the fact that nearly two-thirds of this entire appropriaion is to be used for our insular possessions.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I am much pleased to learn that my friend from Georgia has read the hearings before the House committee. I wish he had done the committee of the Senate the honor to have read the hearings held before that committee.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator has the Senate committee given us any report in regard to that matter?

Mr. PERKINS. Most certainly they have.

Mr. CLAY. I have the report before me here, and if there are any reasons given for it I have not been able to find them.

Mr. PERKINS. I will read them, then, to my friend. I read from page 21 of the statement of General Crozier before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations:

Senator PERKINS. In your letter to the Secretary of War you also make the following recommendation:

"GUN CARRIAGES FOR INSULAR POSSESSIONS.

"In providing for guns, carriages, and emplacements for the insular possessions in the acts of April 21, 1904, March 3, 1905, and the pending bill, the 12-inch guns and their emplacements have been carried ahead of the carriages therefor, so that the guns, carriages, and emplacements do not balance. The carriages are seven short of the necessary number, and to provide them the appropriation carried in lines 3 and 4 of page 8 should be increased by $365,000, making the total sum appropriated under the item $565,000. The discrepancy has been growing since the first act was passed, and results from misunderstandings arising in reducing the estimates made by the War Department, which, as submitted, balance."

This you explained to the House committee, General, but still they failed to act upon your recommendation.

General CROZIER. I did not have a complete opportunity to explain it to the House committee, because I did not know exactly the shape in which the bill was coming out of the committee.

Senator PERKINS. Will you explain to the committee the status of the case as it appears in your letter here and the reasons why you make this recommendation?

General CROZIER. Yes, sir.

There have been thus far two acts passed which carry fortifications and the armament thereof in the insular possessions. The discrepancy is confined to the emplacements and carriages and guns of the largest size, namely, the guns of 12-inch caliber.

By the act of April 21, 1904, there was a sum of money provided for emplacements for two 12-inch disappearing carriages; by the act of March 3, 1905, for four, and by this act, as it has passed the House of Representatives, for four more, making ten 12-inch emplacements; and authority has been given to use the guns therefor from those which we have on hand, not requiring a new appropriation.

By the act of April 21, 1904, the first of these before-mentioned acts, there was provided money for two 12-inch carriages, balancing the two emplacements; but by the next act, that of March 3, 1905, there was no appropriation made for 12-inch carriages, although one was made for four 12-inch emplacements; and by the bill which you have before you there is only one 12-inch carriage provided for, although provision is made for four 12-inch emplacements.

Senator ALLISON. You are short seven carriages?

General CROZIER. So, adding those figures, you see I am short seven carriages.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very much of the opinion that General Crozier and those in charge are, to use a homely expression, "putting the cart before the horse." I visited your coast from San Diego clear up to Puget Sound. They are putting up emplacements. The guns are lying in the weeds, covered over with oil to keep them from rusting. The great trouble is, they have not men to take care of the guns and the emplacements they have now. There should not be another emplacement or one of these sand pits on these projections into the sea until we have men to take care of the guns and the carriages we have now.

I speak from personal observation of a half a dozen forts. The gun carriages we have are not being employed. They have emplacements where there are no guns and they have guns where they have no emplacements.

Mr. PERKINS. Further answering the Senator from Georgia, I think this is self-explanatory. It is as if we had the running gear of seven wagons, the wheels and axles, and no wagon beds to put on them, and they are therefore useless.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will allow me, they have no men to put the wagon beds on the wagon wheels.

Mr. PERKINS. They have no one to drive the horses. That is true.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to the recommendations of the joint board. I will only read what they are all agreed on:

The joint board is unanimously of the opinion—

(1) That without a fortified naval base in the Philippines the Asiatic fleet can not keep open the lines of communication for supplies from the United States, or between the Army posts within the Philippines, without which supplies the military forces of the United States could not hold command of the islands.

(2) That Manila is not, but that Subig Bay is, suited for a naval base and station, and of all harbors in the archipelago it is the best for the purpose.

(3) That the fortification of Subig Bay is essential to the security of a naval station located there.

(4) That a fortified naval base at Subig Bay will contribute materially to the defense of Manila Bay.

Then I also desire to read what Admiral Dewey says in a letter to Mr. Foss, chairman of the Naval Committee of the House, dated February 14, 1906, with respect to this very bill:

I thereupon went to Subig Bay and spent considerable time in examining it, particularly as to its fitness for a naval base, and came to the conclusion, which has been strengthened by all my subsequent study, that Olongapo was an ideal natural site for a naval station and immeasurably superior to any location in Manila Bay.

Very truly, yours, GEORGE DEWEY.

Now, that proves the proposition that it is the uniform opinion of all those best qualified to judge that Olongapo, Subig Bay, is the place for the naval station. It is easily defended and has sufficient water.

Of course when I spoke about Batan and the coal mines I did not suppose we were going to attach a naval station to a coal mine. A naval station must be placed with regard to other considerations. It has been placed there. Eight hundred thousand dollars was the first appropriation for Subig Bay. We have been appropriating money ever since. The work has begun. There is a dock going there now worth a million and a quarter. I repeat my original figures, which I find confirmed by the House debate, that altogether nearly two million dollars and a half has been authorized or spent at Subig Bay. It is also for the defense of Manila. It is admitted that it is the station we shall always hold in those islands.

Now, I submit that it is bad economy to prohibit the War and Navy Departments from spending any money at Subig Bay. Of course the purpose is to throw the expenditure to Cavite, where no money ought to be spent. It never, by any possibility, can be made a good station, because the water is not there.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the chart of Manila Bay.

Mr. LODGE. I have not been there, but I am fairly familiar with the chart.

Mr. PERKINS. I should also like to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to Batan Island.

Mr. LODGE. I know where that is, too.

Mr. PERKINS. I am sure we did wisely in purchasing those mines.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. But suppose we find an iron mine, and it is wise to secure it; is it then to be argued that we must move the naval station over to the iron mine? The naval station is military. It is not merely to be near a coal mine. The object is the military value, and the military value of Subig Bay is admitted by every expert whose opinion is worth anything. In the judgment of the joint board of the Army and the Navy, Subig Bay is the proper place for a naval base. We have already begun to spend money there——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. If you establish a naval station at Subig Bay, will you not also have to establish one at Manila, and are you in favor of both?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it will be necessary, if we have a strong base at Subig Bay, to enter on very extensive fortifications in Manila Harbor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is only 70 miles away.

Mr. LODGE. It is only 70 miles away, and Manila is such a large bay that the way to protect Manila is with a fleet. The fleet that holds Subig Bay is master of Manila. It may be necessary to have submarine mines in the channel, or something of that kind, but I do not think there is the slightest use of wasting large sums of money in fortifications around Cavite. I think the way to defend Manila Bay is with a powerful fleet. You want a naval station at Subig Bay; you can easily fortify it; and there is where the naval property is and is going to be.

Mr. ELKINS. As I understand it, in order to get to Subig Bay, in order to get deep water, you would have to dredge to a great extent, which would put the Government to great expense.

Mr. LODGE. The facts are exactly the other way. What needs to be done at Subig Bay is to fill in the land for the buildings, because it is now marshy. There is great depth of water in Subig Bay. I am told by naval officers that you can not get a battle ship within 2 miles of Cavite.

Mr. ELKINS. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming, who has been there, if it is not his impression from actual observation that you would have to dredge there in order to get water enough to float a fleet?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to answer, I will say that part of the bay has deep water, but it is a part of the plan of those who advocate Subig Bay as a naval base to dredge more than a mile square, some of it over 20 feet deep.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to call attention to the estimate made by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. It reads as follows:

Toward dredging, filling, and grading, including cost of dredges and necessary tools and equipment (to cost $1,200,000).

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is to be provided this year. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, with his permission, a question.

Mr. LODGE. I will take the map which the Senator has furnished me, showing the depth of water. There are now 6 fathoms of water right in the harbor of Olongapo. It goes up to it.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question about that. The only trouble is it is 70 miles from the place we want to fortify.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Senator allow me to correct him—that is, if the Secretary of War knows anything about it, and I think he does, because he has spent considerable time in the islands. He says it is only 35.

Mr. PERKINS. That must be overland.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean to say it is a shorter distance by land than by water?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts this question, and it is the whole nut of the proposition. If Subig Bay is the place, and I do not controvert it or pretend to say it is not, why did not the Board of Fortifications and Coast Defenses, in submitting their report on February 21, submit a plan to us? They say it is an important port, I will admit, but they make no recommendation as to a plan or how it should be fortified.

Mr. LODGE. I will ask what recommendation they make about Cavite? Have they a plan there?

Mr. PERKINS. Ever since we have had it——

Mr. LODGE. There is no plan for Cavite any more than there is for Subig Bay; but this is a proposition to prohibit any expenditure at Subig Bay and throw the expenditure to Cavite, which, I submit, is a waste of money.

Mr. PERKINS. Admiral Dewey made a plan for the improvement of Manila Bay, and we have been working on those lines ever since.

Mr. LODGE. I am not speaking of improvements to Manila Bay. I am speaking of the fortification of Cavite. They have submitted no plan for that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I do. I yield to any Senator.

Mr. TELLER. If I could get the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, or of some other Senator, I should like to ask him a question. If this money is not expended at Subig Bay, where is it going to be expended? Will somebody tell us that?

Mr. LODGE. Where is the money to be expended if not at Subig Bay? is the question the Senator from Colorado asks.

Mr. PERKINS. It is to be expended, in the discretion of the Board of Fortifications, in Manila Bay, in the islands of Corregidor and Cabello, and in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Colorado will see exactly the point of it. It is to deprive them of discretion as to Subig Bay. They have discretion to spend money without any plan at Cavite or Corregidor or any other point in Manila Bay, but they have no discretion as to Subig Bay, which has been taken as a naval station and where we have made large expenditures.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know much about this bill. While I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, which reported it, I am not a member of the subcommittee, and unfortunately I did not get any notice of the meeting of the committee and was not present at all.

I do not know what it will cost to do this work, but I understand that the naval people are extremely anxious to do this work at Subig Bay. I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts that two millions and a half have already been expended there. Some one says $800,000, and that the remainder has been authorized. I should like to know the character of those expenditures, if some one can tell me.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, if he should go there, unless there has been something very materially added in the last few months, would see a part of a wharf; about what would be built at some siding where cord wood is loaded. That is all there is in sight. The money may have been appropriated and may have been properly used, but from the view point of the bay itself there is nothing in sight except a small wooden pier, which runs out a little ways, where small vessels can unload.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from California, who has this bill in charge, where they propose to expend the money that is to be expended in the Hawaiian Islands? Is there any definite place for that expenditure?

Mr. PERKINS. It will be expended partly in the port of Honolulu and at Pearl Harbor. However, that is a matter which has been agreed upon. The improvement of Pearl Harbor and the fortification of Honolulu have been agreed upon under the plan submitted to our committee, of which the Senator is a member, four years since. But this is a new plan of operation. It is an appropriation of money for which we have no plan, and as the Senator was not present when I read from the reports——

Mr. TELLER. Yes, I was; but I could not hear it over here, with all the noise there is in the Chamber.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to read it again for the benefit of the Senator. It is from the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, an eminent naval officer, the peer of anyone in our Navy or any other navy, and he says what I shall read about Olongapo. The money we appropriated at the last session of Congress, to which the Senator from Massachusetts referred, has not been expended, as I infer from this:

> The progress of work at Olongapo has not been as satisfactory as was hoped. In a measure this is due to the great amount of preliminary work required to prepare the site for the proposed station, and to the fact that the appropriations have not been made in accordance with the natural sequence in which the work of building up should be undertaken. Careful estimates have been made of the manner in which money for the building up of Olongapo could be most economically and judicially expended. Since the land for the site has to be raised from 3 to 5 feet above its present level, the time required to establish a repair station at this place will be between six and seven years; and the estimated cost will be $4,000,000. This should establish a plant which would have a somewhat better output and better facilities than the present station at Cavite.

What your committee claim is that there is no necessity of spending a part of this money at Subig Bay at this time, as we have machine shops and a naval station at Cavite, and the money should be expended there for fortifying the island of Corregidor and the other island that guards the entrance to the bay. When the Board of Fortifications and Coast Defenses shall submit to the Congress a plan for the fortification of Subig Bay, I do not believe there is a member of the committee who will gainsay their recommendation; but until that time comes let us spend this money where it can be advantageously used.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator speaks of these naval and Army officers. Why can we not trust to their discretion? Why must we undertake to prohibit the expenditure of this money at a given place, which will simply involve double expenditure in the end?

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS (to Mr. ALLISON). Mr. TELLER has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon.

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa, because I want some information. I have not got it, and he may have it. So I hope he will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not know that I can give the Senate or the Senator the information required. My chief reason for agreeing to this prohibition of expenditure at Subig Bay was that the committee had no information which would justify them in providing for such expenditure. So far as the statements and reports disclose, there is nothing practically now at Subig Bay, and there will be very little at Subig Bay except this great dry dock, and, as is stated in the report from which the Senator from California has just read, it will take from six to seven years to prepare the ground for the naval station. Therefore, it appeared to us that it was premature for us to undertake now or to allow anybody else to undertake to spend money for fortifications at Subig Bay.

Indeed it seems to me that there is no pressing necessity for spending this money anywhere in the Philippines at this time.

Mr. TELLER. That I agree with.

Mr. ALLISON. But there was a small appropriation provided in the bill as it came from the House, to be expended ratably in the Hawaiian Islands, at Pearl Harbor and Honolulu, and a small appropriation for expenditures in the Philippine Islands. The appropriation in the bill is less than half what is desired. I speak now generally, because I only listened to the testimony taken before the committee and to the reading of reports. Now, there is nowhere that I can discover—and if the Senator from Massachusetts has that information and will give it to us, he will throw a great deal of light upon this subject, so far as I am concerned—any estimate or statement which discloses with reasonable accuracy the cost of the new naval station at Subig Bay.

Mr. LODGE. I can inform the Senator, if he cares to be informed.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. LODGE. I will venture to read the statement of the chairman of the Naval Committee of the House. He said:

> Now, there is one other thing I want to say, and that is that all of these estimates which we hear about, of forty million dollars and a hundred million dollars, and all that sort of thing, are brought in here for no other reason than just to make the proposition look ridiculous. I never heard of them until I heard them on this floor. The first proposition was a proposition between twenty and thirty million dollars, and the last proposition was a proposition brought before our committee by Mr. Secretary Moody, when he was Secretary of the Navy, for $9,000,000, extending over a long period of years. These statements can be verified by referring to the testimony—

Which is in the House hearings. I have not those hearings at hand for the moment. But it has all been laid out, and the $9,000,000 project was agreed to by the House and by the Naval Committee of the Senate subsequently. I can not put my hands on the hearings at this moment of time, but if the Senate will let it go over, I will find it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the information I want. The estimate of $20,000,000 has been reduced, according to the RECORD, from $20,000,000 to $9,000,000; and it is a most remarkable fact that so large a reduction can be made in so short a time.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will excuse me, they never adopted the $20,000,000 proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

Mr. LODGE. They adopted the $9,000,000 project.

Mr. ALLISON. They adopted the modified proposition of $9,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. They did. That was two years ago.

Mr. ALLISON. That was two years ago.

This is an expenditure for a naval station. Now, before any material expenditure has been made at Subig Bay, they ask us in a fortifications bill to appropriate money which may be expended in the discretion of somebody at Subig Bay. The committee believed, and I believe, that it is not wise for us to authorize the expenditure of money at Subig Bay until we have a larger and better notion of the cost.

Besides that, there is practically nothing there to defend, and there will be nothing except this dry dock, which will be there, according to the Senator from California, by Christmas.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. I will.

Mr. LODGE. If he will move to strike from the bill all of the appropriation for the fortification of the Philippines, I will vote with him; but what I object to is this attempt to force the expenditure for fortifications in the Philippines into Cavite, where, from my knowledge of the subject (although I have not been fortunate enough to visit the islands, I have studied the subject for a good many years), I believe it will be a dead waste.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that I am waiting for a good opportunity to move to strike out the words "and the Philippine Islands."

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me a few minutes more I will give him that opportunity.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to hurry the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that when we had a naval station at Port Royal and were endeavoring to build it up, we found great difficulty in getting any encouragement or help from the Navy Department, because, as they said, Port Royal was nowhere. There was plenty of water there; it was a magnificent harbor, but there was no town, no anything. Therefore, after several years of stepmotherly treatment, we consented to have the harbor at Charleston examined relatively to Port Royal; and the naval station was transferred to Charleston, where there is plenty of water under the jetty system which was established by Congress several years ago.

Now, this Subig Bay programme originally contemplated $20,000,000. The Naval Committee was so much taken off its feet, so to speak, by the magnitude of that proposition that it felt unwilling to make any move at all, and finally the naval officers or the board modified and brought down their estimates to $9,000,000. This fortification programme involves, as the Senator from Iowa has just stated, the fortification of a lot of water and nothing else. There is no city there; there is no dock there, except this one that is floating around. We can carry it to Manila Bay just as well as to Subig Bay, if we are going to use it——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me? It is impossible to place the dock at Manila or Cavite, according to the statement of naval officers.

Mr. TILLMAN. It certainly is impossible to place it at Olongapo, because, if the Senator will look at the chart in front of him, he will find that the depth of water is but 12, 13, or 14 feet, and you would have to dredge out the harbor in order to get the dock within a mile of the town.

Mr. ELKINS. It is not that deep.

Mr. TILLMAN. Twelve, 13, or 14 feet. You will have to make a harbor in front of the proposed naval station——

Mr. LODGE. I think you are mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before you can touch it with anything except the expenditure of money. You can have no dock there.

Mr. LODGE. There are 6 fathoms of water immediately against the town.

Mr. TILLMAN. Six fathoms?

Mr. LODGE. Six fathoms.

Mr. TILLMAN. Eleven feet.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations believed that it was unwise to commence fortifications until we had something to defend, especially so when we have a very large plan of additional fortifications to defend our own coast and a very urgent request for the expenditure of money in that direction.

But there was another reason which operated upon my mind with respect to this matter, and that was that I conceived it to be a matter for the Committee on Naval Affairs to determine, first, whether they intend to establish a naval station there to take the place of the station at Cavite. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to think that Subig Bay or this particular point is the only suitable place for a naval station. If we are to have a naval station there, let us have it under a full knowledge of the cost of it, present and prospective, and when we have commenced the work there and have made a substantial progress in it, if it needs the defense that is required from the Army to fortify that coast, then we can make provision for it.

Mr. LODGE. I entirely agree with that proposition. Strike out the Philippines from the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will agree with the Senator on that point; we will have no trouble about it if that is his judgment. He is chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, and the islands are largely in his keeping, and if he thinks that ought to be done I shall follow him.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to strike out the whole Philippine Islands from the bill. What I am not willing to do is to prohibit the expenditure of money at the only point where, in my judgment, money ought to be expended.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I will have a word more in answer to that. Perhaps money ought to be expended at Subig Bay, but it ought not to be expended in building fortifications until we have something to defend. Therefore, whatever money is expended at Subig Bay should be expended after a full and careful consideration of the matter by the Committee on Naval Affairs. No better reason can be given for that than the fact that the Senator from California and the Senator from South Carolina, both of whom are members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, have already looked into this matter to a degree which convinces them that we should not fortify Subig Bay, because they are both on the Committee on Appropriations and both voted for this amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to emphasize that fact, if the Senator please. The general commanding the Division of the Philippine Islands has not reported in favor of it. His report in 1903 was rather against it. The last report of Major-General Corbin was in 1905, and he has not a word to say about it. He is silent.

Mr. LODGE. I do not suppose he was reporting on a naval station.

Mr. PERKINS. No.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. PERKINS. Reports on fortifications and recommendations for fortifications are under the War Department. When it comes to consider the question under the Navy Department, the Committee on Naval Affairs will try to give it a careful consideration and recommend what they believe to be in the interests of the Navy.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he would be glad to vote in favor of striking from the bill every feature of it that relates to our insular possessions.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no, Mr. President, I did not say anything of the kind. I said I would be glad to strike the Philippines out of this paragraph, and I hope it will be done.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. What I am trying to prevent is forcing the Government to wast money at Cavite. That is what I am trying to prevent.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. With all this talk of the waste of money it is not proposed to spend one dollar of this appropriation at Cavite except that expending it at the mouth of Manila Bay and protecting Manila will, incidentally, of course, protect Cavite.

Mr. LODGE. Anyone who will look at the map will see that Cavite is not the place to protect Manila Bay.

Mr. WARREN. It is not claimed that it is, but the narrow entrance to Manila Bay, of course, is to be protected by proper fortifications.

Mr. LODGE (indicating on the map). Cavite is in there. The entrance to the bay is out there.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. I have yielded to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], and he has the floor.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he is in favor of striking out of the bill everything that relates to our insular possessions.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; the Senator could not have understood me to say that, and he knows I never did say it.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator says I misunderstood him. I was going to ask the Senator, if he did say that, how he had reached the conclusion that it was not necessary for us to fortify in order to defend the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LODGE. It is not necessary for me to explain a statement I did not make.

Mr. CLAY. Then I understand the Senator to say that he is in favor of striking from the bill everything that has reference to seacoast batteries in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LODGE. I never said it, or anything resembling it.

Mr. CLAY. Then the Senator did say he is in favor of striking from the bill lines 5, 6, 7, and 8?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President, I did not say that.

Mr. CLAY. What did the Senator say?

Mr. LODGE. I said I was in favor of striking out all of this paragraph that relates to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CLAY. The paragraph reads as follows:

For construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, $600,000.

Mr. LODGE. That is not striking out the Philippines.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator did say he is in favor of striking out everything in the paragraph that relates to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. I did, and I repeat it.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator admit, then, that it would leave it in this shape, that the appropriation of $600,000 shall be applied to the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; and the appropriation can be well applied to Pearl Harbor.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator have any idea how much money it would take to perfect our coast defenses in the Philippine Islands? Has he any idea how much money we will have to spend there in order to get through with this work? I see that this bill carries $5,000,000, and two-thirds of this vast sum is to go to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. I am not upon the Committee on Appropriations. I have no doubt the Senator from California, who is very familiar with this subject, can tell the Senator in one moment what will be required to fortify the Philippines. But I can not do it, as the fortifications are not within the province of the Philippines Committee. I am only protesting here against what I believe will be a wasteful expenditure of the public money. If money is to be spent for fortifications it ought not to be spent at Cavite. Of that I am satisfied.

Mr. CLAY. I agree with the Senator in regard to that.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator aware of the fact I state that there is no fortification intended at Cavite, but at the entrance to the bay? Cavite is situated in one part of the bay and Manila at another, and you can not protect Manila without incidentally protecting Cavite. The fortifications are at the mouth of the bay.

Mr. LODGE. If this money is to be spent in the Philippine Islands for fortifications it is to be spent either at Subig Bay or at Manila Bay, or in both places.

Mr. CLAY. Why does the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. If you prohibit its being spent at Subig Bay, it must be spent for the defense of Cavite and Manila. There is no plan for that any more than there is for Subig Bay. I think we had better let the whole thing go rather than put in this prohibition.

Mr. CLAY. Why does the Senator say the money must be spent at the places designated by himself? If the amendment in lines 6 and 7 is stricken out would it not be spent in the discretion of the War Department anywhere they might choose?

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking of the bill as it stands, not of the bill as it will be.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] asked me to yield to him. I will yield to him now if he desires.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I think before we commence to spend money either at Subig Bay or in the Hawaiian Islands, or at any other place further than is now under contract, we first should provide men to take care of the work. If the Senate does not intend to support a bill that has been sent to the Committee on Military Affairs by the War Department increasing the Coast Artillery 10,000 men, in my judgment every dollar that we appropriate for additional fortifications and in spending money for these very expensive guns is money very illy appropriated, and certainly wasteful, because they are not being taken care of. As I said a moment ago, there are fortifications and emplacements where you have no guns. There are other places where you have guns and you have no fortifications, and you have no men to take care of them. At other places you have carriages and other munitions of war that are going to waste because they are not properly cared for. Unless you are going to increase the Coast Artillery, in my judgment you might just as well save the money that it is proposed to appropriate for these additional fortifications and emplacements.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think this condition is rather unusual. We are here with a bill under which some Senators think we ought to spend money in one place and others in another. There is, I understand, no detailed plan that anybody can depend upon as to the character of the expenditure at Subig Bay.

As stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, $20,000,000 were suggested. Nobody who listened to that suggestion had any idea that $20,000,000 would complete what the naval people wanted. But suddenly, when they found that was not acceptable, they dropped it to $9,000,000. Of course, we understood they would go on with the $9,000,000 if they got it. They would make some kind of an arrangement for the fortification and defense of that harbor; and later we would be called upon to make a further expenditure, and nobody knows how much that expenditure would be.

I think the mistake the committee made was that they did not strike out all about the Philippine Islands in the beginning, that they did not confine themselves to the harbor and fortifications of the place they have some knowledge of, and that, of course, is Pearl Harbor, and not the Philippine Islands. I was not present at the hearing nor when the conclusion was reached. I am not able to say whether the $600,000 now would be properly applied in the Hawaiian Islands or not, but I have discovered that no matter how large you make the appropriation for these coast and harbor defenses you will never have enough; there will always be a cry for more. So, I have no doubt, if we should strike out the word "Philippines" here and leave it an appropriation for the Hawaiian Islands alone, that money would be expended as other money is expended. Whether it will be enough to complete the work there or not I do not know, but I should presume not.

Mr. President, in the first place, I do not think we should enter upon a series of experiments in the Philippine Islands; that is to say, I do not thnk we should commence on this harbor and then on the other harbor, putting money here and money there. I think Congress should have a definite and determined plan. If we are going to expend money in the Philippine Islands, we should select some place which is the best place to spend our money, where we will get the most possible for it. And I want to guarantee now that you will not get very much from the expenditure, whichever harbor or whichever bay you select. But there should be some determinate plan. We can not possibly fortify all the harbors.

Now, what is the necessity of our fortifyng any harbor in the Philippine Islands? If we have a foreign war, we shall defend them entirely, if we attempt to protect the Philippine Islands, with our Navy; and if we fail with the Navy, we shall fail no matter how much money we put on fortifications.

The recent developments of modern warfare have shown that it is beyond the possibility of man's genius to create fortifications that the modern guns can not destroy. It was said before the Russian and Japanese war that Port Arthur could be defended against the combined fleets of the world. It probably was the strongest place in the world, so far as artificial means were concerned; and yet it went down before a second-class nation's fleet. If we ever have a war that will require fortifications in the Philippine Islands, we will require such fortifications as will take not $20,000,000, or $200,000,000, but $500,000,000. We may make some defense of those islands with our ships, but we shall find that if we are ever met by a war with any nation on earth that has got a fleet, little or great, every man in the United States will wish that before the islands came to us they had disappeared from the sight of man.

Mr. President, they are an encumbrance upon us. I should like to have somebody tell me how much money we have expended in the seven or eight years that we have been dealing with those islands. You can not get any reliable statement from any official of the Government. Nobody wants to say what it has cost. Very few men could show the amount if they should try. I remember that as much as three years ago the then senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, declared on the floor of the Senate, after a careful and detailed statement, that more than $600,000,000 had then been expended. Within two months afterwards the senior senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] declared on this floor that he had made a calculation, the best that he could get, and $650,000,000 had been expended. Two years ago and more a distinguished statistician of Massachusetts, a friendly statistician, a man friendly to the Administration now in power, declared that we had expended in the Philippine Islands $800,000,000.

Mr. President, we have spent a great deal of money there. We have got practically nothing back, as everybody knows. Our trade, if every dollar of it was profit, would not begin to compensate us for the expenditures of the last year, let alone the numerous years before. We do buy a little of them, and we sell a very little to them. I hope the time will come when we shall be rid of the Philippine Islands. I hope the time is not far distant when the American people will conclude that it is not the province of a nation like ours to attempt the civilization of any other country perforce.

In the whole history of the world there is no instance where a nation outside of another has been able to elevate them in civilization and in morals. I deny that any Senator can show me a single instance where civilization has not come from the inside and never where it has come from the outside. In making this statement not long ago a Senator said to me: "I will point to you India." The civilization of India, with nearly two hundred years of English administration, is not one whit better to-day, except in a few particulars, than it was nearly two hundred years ago.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have made inquiry, and I find no one who is ready to go on with the discussion of the rate bill this morning, though we have promise of a good many speeches to-morrow and the next day. I therefore ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily in order that the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill may be completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. LODGE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. MORGAN were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 15744. An act to abolish the office of Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 15848. An act authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. J. Res. 117. Joint resolution extending the time for opening to public entry the unallotted lands on the ceded portion of the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in Wyoming, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the Philippine question, whether we ought to hold the islands, or whether we ought to abandon them, and I will not take the time of the Senate further on that question. I simply want to move now to strike out of line 6, page 8, the words "and Philippine Islands," leaving the appropriation, unless some one chooses to move to reduce it, of $600,000 to go to the Hawaiian Islands. I think it must be apparent that we are not in a condition to determine whether we ought to put this money on Subig Bay or on Manila Bay. That leaves it entirely to be spent on the Hawaiian Islands. I understood some Senators on the other side to say it could be profitably and properly expended under present conditions at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in his desire to get rid of the Philippine Islands, and I hardly think this is the time, on the fortifications appropriation bill, to discuss a question so broad and of so much importance. The fact is, I think the Philippine Islands, as we have them, will prove of great advantage to the United States. I think they furnish a base for operations in the East, where we must extend our commerce and protect American interests. Relatively, our trade and commerce with the Orient is destined to be more important than with Europe.

It does not belong to Anglo-Saxon blood to give up land under any circumstances. I never knew a man who had land so poor that he would give it up or allow somebody to take it for nothing. I have never known the Anglo-Saxons as a nation in any part of the world to give up land once conquered or acquired.

I do not see why the proposition is so frequently brought into this Chamber to surrender the Philippine Islands, which I consider valuable possessions in the East. Give them up? Surrender to whom, how, when, and for what? I think the Philippine Islands are, as I said, necessary to the establishment and expansion of our commerce, and I think they will never be given up or surrendered by the United States any more than Porto Rico, or Cuba if we had it, or any other island or any other land; any more than we would give up Arizona, New Mexico, or any part of our national domain. The Philippine Islands constitute a part or portion of the territory of the United States.

It does not belong to American policy and the American mind to give up real estate—land situate anywhere the flag floats on this globe. Territory is becoming limited, anyway. There are few places not occupied. The United States, by the fortunes of war, finds itself in possession of the Philippines, and I hope it will keep them not only now, but for all time, and I believe it will. I don't believe the time will ever come when the people will give up the Philippine Islands.

Now, Mr. President, coming to this amendment, the Committee on Appropriations had hearings and gave the subject very careful consideration. The chief objection to appropriating this sum of money was that the undertaking would involve the expenditure of very large sums of money—some said $40,000,000, some said $50,000,000, and others got it down as low as $9,000,000. Before beginning operations of this magnitude we should have ample time to find a suitable and the best place to fortify, if we are going to fortify at all. I do not see any pressing necessity for fortifying just now. I do not know of any nation that wants to take the islands away from us. If they do, they will find at least half of this Chamber on the other side ready to give them up without fortifying them.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator he would find it very difficult to find any nation to take them, if offered as a gift.

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad of that, but I find that a part of the Senate thinks they would be willing to give them up. But I hardly think we will give them up.

Mr. President, the sum involved here is only $600,000, and it is to be distributed to other portions of our possessions. Some of it goes to Honolulu. I have looked at this chart, and unquestionably, if I am right, for a mile out from land at Olongapo the water is in places only a fourth of a fathom and half a fathom and one and a quarter fathoms deep. Out about a mile the water begins to be six fathoms. Farther out it is twelve, seventeen, and nineteen fathoms.

We should not begin operations on this scale—great improvements, permanent, and to last forever—without some definite knowledge, and surely not at a place that will require a mile of excavation before you can get to the mainland.

Mr. LODGE. At Cavite?

Mr. ELKINS. I am not for Cavite any more than I am for this place just now. I think we need more light on the subject.

Mr. LODGE. That is right.

Mr. ELKINS. If the great party that seems so eager to give up the Philippine Islands should succeed, unfortunately for the country, at the next election or the election thereafter, and give them up, we will save the money by not making this appropriation, and the country we cede them to will not have the fortifications.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to make the suggestion to the Senator that if he desires to assist the Democratic party in the next election I hope he will persuade the people that they are in favor of giving up the Philippines.

Mr. ELKINS. The Democratic party?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not think when you come to test it squarely, although there is a great deal of talk in this Chamber, that the Democratic party will commit itself to any such policy. I think the Democrats have a good deal of human nature in them. They are of just about the same blood as the Republicans, and when it comes to giving up anything for nothing or to persuading somebody to take our property for nothing, they will be found about as far from doing it as Republicans are. I do not think, when it comes to the test, the Democratic party will give up the Philippines under any circumstances, especially without a consideration, and I do not believe the Democratic party will put a surrender or give-up plank in their next platform. If they should, the Republican party is willing and will meet them on that issue, as it has met them upon other great issues before the people.

Mr. TELLER. That is, they will put it in their platform, too, I suppose.

Mr. ELKINS. The Republicans will declare and say they will never surrender our possessions and give them up for nothing, possessions that have cost us money and blood.

Mr. TELLER. And that have cost us a good deal of money.

Mr. ELKINS. And a good deal of blood.

Mr. President, I hope the committee will be sustained in the position it has taken.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have no wish to discuss general Philippine policy or politics at the present time. We have before us a fortifications appropriation bill, not for making naval appropriations, but for making appropriations to fortify various harbors and places throughout the United States and its insular possessions.

Subig Bay, or Olongapo, as it is called, contains nothing now to defend. According to the Senator from Massachusetts, and I take it for granted he is correct, there have been appropriations of a million or two made, and they are yet unexpended, as everyone knows who has visited the place. So there is no necessity at this time for appropriating any money for fortifying Subig Bay, because they have not expended what they have already in hand and there is nothing in the bay calling for defense.

It is unnecessary to appropriate now, because there is nothing there to protect. It would be foolish indeed to take any portion of the $600,000, that small amount, and use it at Subig Bay at the present time when the money is so much needed at other places where we have something to protect—the Hawaiian Islands, Manila Bay, and possibly other points. If the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to leave Manila Bay, and thus the city of Manila and Cavite, without fortifications, and his amendment should carry, the responsibility will have to be with him and those who think with him.

When that Senator or any Senator claims that Subig Bay protects Manila, then he might, with equal justice, claim that Boston Harbor protects Washington, and we might as well roll the guns we have along the Potomac down into the river.

Mr. LODGE. I am sure the Senator does not mean to misquote me. I said the fleet would protect Manila, and if Manila had any other protection than Subig Bay, it would necessarily be the fleet.

Mr. WARREN. Then, does the Senator say that he does not want to fortify the entrance of Manila Bay?

Mr. LODGE. We have no plan for fortifying either place. We could use torpedoes and guns at the opening of Manila Bay.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Massachusetts ought not to deceive himself or others. It is not a matter of guns, etc., at Manila and Cavite. It is the entrance of the bay, where there is narrow deep water, with the banks high on each side and with the Corregidor Islands in the channel, through which every vessel must go to reach Cavite or Manila, 15 or 20 miles away. When you have fortified that bay you have fortified about all there is at present in the Philippine Islands in the way of property interests, or at least you have the key to the Philippines. When you fortify Subig Bay you fortify a sheet of water that has as yet practically nothing in it, surrounded by a country that is nearly as wild as this country was before Christopher Columbus discovered it. There is nothing there. I am not inveighing against Subig Bay as a place for a great naval base in time, but it is unnecessary to appropriate at this time when it will take four or five years to prepare the ground, do the dredging, etc., ready for building. It is unnecessary now to erect fortifications and provide in this bill—which is for fortifications alone—a sum to fortify Subig Bay.

Senators talk about $9,000,000, and about $18,000,000; and in another place certain members talked about $100,000,000; and it was stated, I think by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that $4,000,000 or more would be required to prepare the land. With all that uncertainty is it not best for this Senate to have some kind of a base to work upon in the way of estimates before we take a little pickayunish matter of $600,000, needed elsewhere, and divide it up and use a portion of it for defending that naked sheet of water, with nothing in sight or nothing of consequence within 70 miles of it?

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator from Wyoming ever landed at Olongapo, or has he ever been in Olongapo?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that there is a small town there and that it is not an absolute wilderness, as the Senator has stated. The statement is that there is a town there with 1,200 inhabitants.

Mr. WARREN. I think that is a mistake. I have not landed there, but in sailing in and about the bay there is not a thing in sight. People in Manila, officers of the Navy and Army, who have been there and who are charged with the responsibility of it make the statement that every hut, building, and shop must be put up there anew; and it has seemed to us that it is the part of wisdom not to follow the proposition with works of defense just now.

Now, as to Cavite, we have a very considerable navy-yard that cost four or five million dollars; we have several hundreds or thousands of men employed there who have homes in the city of Cavite; and we can get along very well there until such time as Congress may, first, ascertain what we need; second, what it will cost; and then, third, appropriate that sum accordingly. We are in no immediate necessity for an additional naval base. Suppose for the present we continue the use of Cavite, although it may not be as good as what might be made at Subig Bay.

I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, when the proper time comes, if Subig is determined to be the proper place to make a great naval port or base, I shall be very glad to join with others; but it is the business of the Navy to provide, first, something for us to defend before we erect fortification works. So far they are at odds; they do not agree. There are two sides to the matter. They are hesitating there whether or not they will spend the money we have already appropriated. Then why shall we, in an appropriation bill intended for fortifications alone, jump in and fortify some wild place, when it will be, according to the best calculations here, from three to ten years before there is a single structure to defend?

I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will not prevail, because there is no question but what we ought to fortify the entrace to Manila Bay. It is idle to say because we fortfy New York that Baltimore is fortified, or because we fortify Boston, a few hundred miles away, that Washington is fortified.

It does not matter what we do at Subig Bay or when we do it, we must expend some money at the mouth of Manila Bay just the same; and this $600,000, which can be divided betweeen the Hawaiian Islands and the mouth of Manila Bay, will not give them more than they need, nor as much; and this is all for which this bill for this one year provides and all we need to now consider. If anything is necessary at Subig Bay, and if they want an appropriation later and can tell us anything about it, I will very cheerfully vote in favor of whatever sum it may be, even if it be $6,000,000 instead of $600,000; but I hope the present bill will stand as the committee reported it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only desire to say that there are no more plans for the fortification of Manila Bay than there are for the fortification of Subig Bay. We are just as much in the dark, so far as plans go, about one place as about the other.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator make that statement as a matter of definite knowledge?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I understand to the contrary. I understand the plans are in the Philippine Islands for fortifying Manila Bay.

Mr. TELLER. The plans may be in the Philippines.

Mr. LODGE. But they are not here.

Mr. TELLER. We have not the plans.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. TELLER. I have never seen them.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, is it possible we are called upon to make appropriations for the erection of fortifications in the Philippines or anywhere else upon estimates made in the absence of plans for the work?

Mr. LODGE. I think that is likewise true as to Subig Bay, Cavite, and Manila Bay. I do not think there are plans for either of the places, so far as Congress knows anything about it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then why should those be dealt with at all?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think they ought to be. I think it is better not to make an appropriation for seacoast fortifications in the Philippines at this time. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. I think that is the wise and prudent thing to do.

I want to read in that connection, as showing the condition of the question, from Secretary Taft's testimony before the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman:

Senator HALE. I do not want to take much of your time as to details, but which do you think is the better place for a naval station as a base of operation if we maintain our possession there for a good many years?

Secretary TAFT. Well, were we to leave the islands, Olongapo is of course—I think everybody will admit—where the naval station ought to be retained. Cavite in many respects is more convenient, labor can be obtained there more easily, and it is more convenient to Manila, which is the source of supply in the islands, and Cavite is the place where we already have a naval arsenal. The difficulty about Cavite, however, is the insufficient depth of water and the limited territory which could be occupied for a naval station. Now, the dry dock Dewey, which is on its way to Manila, or to the Philippines rather, can only be placed at Olongapo; it can not be taken to Cavite, because the water is so shallow that it could not be used there.

Then this question was asked by the Senator from Connecticut:

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is it not true that the Spaniards always had in contemplation the Olongapo station as their principal base?

Secretary TAFT. Yes, sir; there is great controversy going on—for this matter is deemed of importance—between professional authorities in the Navy and in the Army as to whether Olongapo is the best place from a strategic point of view. Admiral Dewey and others of the Navy Department feel that as long as there is a fleet in Olongapo no foreign enemy would venture to go into Manila, because it is supposed that they would regard it as a trap. On the other hand, Admiral Folger and General Wood, and I believe General Corbin, have been of the opinion that Manila, because we have military forces there and because it is near Cavite, makes Cavite the more convenient place. The objection to Cavite, as I have already said, is the insufficient territory available for the Government there and the very shallow water off the shore.

There is a dispute among the naval and military authorities, who, I think, probably would like us to expend great sums of money on all these places; but there are no plans before Congress for either of the places, so far as I am aware or have been able to discover. I think, under those circumstances, the best way is to strike the words "and Philippine Islands" out of this paragraph, as the Senator from Colorado suggests.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Colorado will prevail. It may be true that the time has not come to make appropriations for the fortification of Subig Bay, but I am very strongly of the opinion that the time will never come when we ought to make appropriations for the fortification of Cavite; and for the purpose of preventing an unfortunate expenditure of money there, I am in favor of striking it out altogether. Cavite can never be made a proper place as a naval or a coaling station, because the natural conditions forbid it. It is not simply the fact of its shallow water, but there is no harbor there, and there never can be a harbor there unless we build a sea wall, at an immense expense, and in that way protect it from the open sea, which lies in front.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is informed as to Cavite. He says it needs the protection of a sea wall; but I ask the Senator if it will not take exactly the same in Subig Bay? We have already spent considerable money at Manila; a sea wall has been built, dredging has been done; and it can be done at Cavite, and Cavite can be made a good harbor. Sea wall and dredging will be necessary at Subig Bay. I am not advocating that, and I am not inveighing against Subig Bay. It is well, however, to note, as we go along, that Cavite can be made a good harbor, just the same as Subig Bay can. It is only a matter of the same expenditure or even less.

Mr. BACON. I do not know how far what the Senator says about Subig Bay may be correct, but if it has the same physical conditions as Cavite I think the criticisms upon it are well founded. To give an illustration of how shallow that water is, I will state that after the battle of Manila Bay, when a number of small vessels were sunk, so far as I am informed, not a single one of them was of sufficient depth to disappear from sight. They were small vessels, and although they were, in technical parlance, sunk, they still remained out of water—even the smallest of them. The largest vessel engaged on the side of the Spaniards, I think, was only 2,500 gross tons, and that was almost as high out of the water after it was sunk as when it was afloat. A number of the smaller vessels were still apparent above the water, and these were miles out from the shore. It opens upon a bay twenty-odd miles in width, and when the wind blows it is just the same as on the seashore. There is no protection for vessels. If that be true of Subig Bay also, then neither one of them ought to be utilized for these purposes. But I will state that my information has always been to the contrary; that, while there is a port at Subig Bay that needs to be dredged, there are other ports that have deep water, and which have the advantage of being protected by a harbor, which Cavite has not.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact that the Spaniards had selected Subig Bay as a point for a naval station and had made considerable expenditure of money there?

Mr. BACON. I have no definite knowledge on that subject.

Mr. LODGE. That is true.

Mr. FRYE. That is my understanding, and I think that appeared before the Commission at Paris.

Mr. BACON. I never before heard the matter questioned about Subig Bay being a proper place.

Mr. LODGE. Admiral Dewey looked in to see if there was a fleet there.

Mr. BACON. I think, in view of the fact stated, that the best way is to strike out that clause until we get definite information and have plans of the fortifications, so as to act intelligently and safely in what we do.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to a paper that came in with the President's message, which was transmitted to Congress on the 5th of March, 1906, which is fairly recent; and at the close of that report, signed by the Secretary of War, the Lieutenant-General of the Army, and others, they say:

Among the places recommended to be defended, the following, in the order named, are considered of special importance: Entrance to Chesapeake Bay, eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, Puget Sound, Subig Bay, Guantanamo, and entrance to Manila Bay.

That is signed by Secretary Taft, General Chaffee, General Bates, Rear-Admiral Thomas, General Story, General Greely, General Crozier, General Mackenzie, General Mills, and Captain Sperry of the Navy.

In a communication of February 1, 1906, containing a list of the ports, they include Subig Bay among the ports of first importance, and Manila Bay among the ports of secondary importance.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. That report was favorable to fortifying Manila Bay. The Senator differs slightly with the position he took earlier this morning, in which he said there was no need of fortifications at Manila Bay.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it needed no fortifications. I said it would be a waste of money to spend it at Cavite.

Mr. WARREN. And I have said several times—perhaps the Senator may not have noticed it—that there is no intention and has not been any intention of appropriating any money in the fortifications bill to be expended at Cavite.

Mr. LODGE. So far as Manila Bay is concerned, we have no plans. They admit it is of secondary importance. In our present state of knowledge, it seems to me the wise and prudent thing to do is to strike out the words "and Philippines," and disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. PERKINS rose.

Mr. LODGE. I hope, Mr. President, that the committee amendment will be passed over, as it is entirely dependent upon the action on the other amendments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that the pending question is a disagreement with the committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. No; on the amendment to strike out the words "and Philippines."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee. Under the agreement, the committee amendments are first to be considered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And then later on, as I understand, after the committee amendments are disposed of, an amendment will be offered to strike out of this bill all items relating to fortifications in the Philippines?

DEPARTMENTAL INFORMATION AFFECTING MARKETS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask consent at this time to submit a conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10129) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 6, 9, and 10.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 11, and 12; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 2, line 14, after the word "thereof," insert "and every Member of Congress;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference is in some doubt as to its authority to insert this amendment, but believing that the object and purpose of the bill will not be completely effected without it, recommends the insertion of the amendment, and asks the judgment of the two Houses thereon.

C. D. CLARK,
KNUTE NELSON,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. JENKINS,
C. E. LITTLEFIELD,
H. D. CLAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator who submits the report would tell us something about it, especially after the question of order which the report itself suggests.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Colorado the question of order in the report is this: The bill as passed both Houses provides a punishment for the disclosure of knowledge and for speculation in matters affected by that knowledge which has been acquired in an official capacity. It was discovered by the conferees that Members of Congress in either House were not included. It was further ascertained that judicial decisions have held time and again that Members of Congress are not officers of the United States, but are officers of the State governments. Therefore, while doubting their real power as a conference committee to insert this provision, they thought the objects and purposes of the bill clearly demanded such a provision, so they inserted "and Members of Congress," and ask the judgment of the two Houses upon that amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have no objection to "Members of Congress" being included, but I do object to its being put in the conference report. I object to letting down the rule, which has prevailed ever since we have had a Government, that a conference report should not contain any new legislation. This is absolutely new legislation, and to it I raise the point of order. If the Senator will get this matter up in a separate bill, I will be willing to vote for it, but I am not willing to yield this point now and make a precedent of this kind.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There was no purpose on the part of the conference committee to usurp any authority. I think probably it is the first time that a conference committee has come before this body with a suggestion that perhaps they had not the authority to do a certain thing and submitted the question to the Senate. I submit to the Senator from Colorado, however, that in a matter of this kind, where an order is made sustaining or refusing to sustain a conference committee, it is done by the Senate itself, and that the same rule prevails in another body, where the simple suggestion of new legislation rejects a conference report. All that the conferees desire is the judgment of the Senate upon that point.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me ask the Senator what was the language in difference between the two Houses?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There was no language in difference between the two Houses that would call for this amendment.

Mr, SPOONER. Then the Senator confesses this is entirely usurpatory?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I do not confess that.

Mr. SPOONER. It is either properly there or improperly there.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That may be, but one can not always tell what is proper or what is improper. The committee say in their report, as the Senator would have known if he had listened, that it is in doubt as to its authority in this matter, and submits it to the two Houses.

Mr. SPOONER. I am simply trying to elicit information, if I can, from the Senator to enable me to form some judgment, for one, as to whether the committee was right or wrong. It is impossible to do that unless one can know what the conference was upon and what was the difference between the two Houses. The Senate amended the bill. It did not concur, of course, in the bill as it came from the House, or there would have been no conference.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator ask for all the differences between the two bodies?

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to know what was the proposition in difference between the two Houses upon which the conference committee ingrafted this provision as to Members of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I can not say that there was any.

Mr. KEAN. Then, how did the bill get in conference?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, there were differences on the bill itself.

Mr. KEAN. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There were various differences on the bill. There were ten or twelve amendments which the Senate made to the House bill.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me, were they differences as to the persons upon whom the bill, if enacted, would be operative? In other words, is there any pretext even on which there was jurisdiction in the committee to apply this proposition to Members of Congress?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator puts a square question so squarely that it is almost impossible to answer it. The conference committee supposed that the purpose of both Houses was to prevent these things being done by any officer of the United States Government. They also supposed that both Houses understood at the time they passed the bill that it would probably refer to Members of Congress, who have now and then been charged with such offenses.

Mr. SPOONER. Ought it not to include them? Why should it not technically? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it should, but the conference committee has referred it to the Senate and House of Representatives to say whether they want to include the provision in this way.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to withdraw the point of order in this case. The controversy arises on the second section of the bill, which prohibits, under penalty, officers or employees of the Government of the United States speculating on facts which come to their knowledge by virtue of their offices. It was a question—and there is possibility of some doubt on the question—as to whether the general terms used include members of the two Houses of Congress. The committee of conference, of which I happened to be one, assuming, for the sake of the argument, that members of Congress are not included, have frankly presented the matter to the Senate and to the House of Representatives and submitted it to their judgment.

If his bill passes without including members of Congress we will have the anomalous condition—a condition that ought not to exist—of all officers of the United States Government, all employees of the United States Government, and all persons who may acquire knowledge by virtue of their relationship to the Government of the United States prohibited from such conduct, except members of the two Houses of Congress. It is an exception, Mr. President, that ought not to exist, an exception that ought not to arise; and, in order that it may not exist, I again appeal to the Senator from Colorado to withdraw his point of order, and let us perfect this legislation in the way submitted by the committee.

It is not an attempt on the part of the committee to sneak in any surreptitious way legislation through the two Houses; but it is an honest attempt, a sincere attempt, a frank attempt on the part of the conference committee to round out and complete legislation which ought to be upon the statute book. I submit to the Senator from Colorado than an objection on his part will prevent the completeness of legislation of this character—legislation which, under the peculiar circumstances surrounding us now, ought to be on the statute book.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I express my surprise at the appeal of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. His argument is based upon the theory that whatever we want to do we can do. That is all there is of it.

If it is necessary or desirable to include in the principles of this proposed law Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, it must be done according to law; and there is no question that it can be done by practically the unanimous vote of this body.

It is not a question whether you are going to round out the law; it is a question whether you are going to enact laws in accordance with the Constitution of the United States. There is no authority, Mr. President, here or anywhere else, for a conference committee to legislate and incorporate in a conference report that which neither of the bodies has ever considered.

Does the Senator from Texas think for a moment that that can be done now and a precedent created that will not be repeated again and again until we shall surrender the right of legislation to a conference committee—a conference committee appointed frequently against the judgment both of the Senate and of the House, a conference committee not infrequently appointed to exercise powers that are great enough, without giving them the power to incorporate new legislation into a bill which they are considering?

We know, Mr. President, that many a bill has become a law because a conference committee conceded what this body or the other had declared ought not to be conceded, and we have been powerless here. We shall not be powerless while I have a voice on the floor of the Senate, if it comes by my withdrawing my point of order. I propose to stand by it. I propose to stand by it, but not because I object to including Senators and Representatives. If that had been the proposition on the floor, I would have voted for it, although I know that a Senator is not an officer of the United States, nor is a Member, and I know also that there might be some question exactly as to how it ought to be done and why it should be done. But I do know that this body has no right to accept from the committee legislation that has not been considered in either body.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee knows that when he comes here and tells us practically that there is not any authority for it, but that there is a necessity. Mr. President, I regret to hear in this body a statement that there is a necessity which requires us to violate the fundamental principles of law, and principles, too, which are absolutely necessary for the safety of the minority of every public body dealing with these questions. I shall not withdraw my objection, Mr. President. There is not a Senator here who does not know that the law is against the procedure which is proposed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado says that this method would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. If I thought that, or if the Senator can point out in what respect this method is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, if it amounted to anything, I would withdraw my appeal. I understand it is merely a violation of the rule of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is not a violation of the rule?

Mr. TELLER. It is a violation of the rules and a violation of the Constitution both.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not so understand the latter; and as I said, if I thought so, or if the Senator from Colorado could point out to me wherein it did, I would withdraw the appeal. I think I am amenable to reason upon the subject; and, of course, in view of what the Senator has said, I do not suggest any further the withdrawal of the point of order.

But, Mr. President, this is no attempt on the part of a conference committee to pass legislation without the consideration of the two Houses of Congress. As the Senator will remember, the committee pointedly and expressly submits this matter to the two Houses of Congress for their consideration. That is the language of the report. Of course the Senate may, upon presentation and consideration of the subject, decline to approve this action of the committee; or if any member of the Senate, for whatever reason, objects I accept his objection without qualification and without reference to what reason he may have for it, according to him the same motive that actuated the committee in that respect. But, Mr. President, at the same time, in justice to the committee, it ought to be reiterated that the committee has expressly submitted this matter for the consideration and action of the Senate as a body, admitting that it is probably in violation of the rules of the Senate. However, so far as I know, it never occurred to any member of the committee that it is in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

I have no feeling about the matter, Mr. President—none in the world; but I did say, and I have no hesitation in repeating in my place in this body, that it would be unfortunate if we should knowingly, and after the matter had been called to our attention, pass a law on this subject which would include every official who may have knowledge upon subjects of this character, by virtue of his relationship to the Government of the United States, except members of either House of Congress. While I do not expect to go into that matter in any further detail, I repeat that there is reason for the amendment; and I understand the Senator from Colorado to say that he would not object to an independent and separate measure carrying out the recommendations of the committee in respect to this matter, if it came in regularly from the committee to which it was referred and was submitted in the regular manner to this body. That being true, I thought that possibly, in order to complete this legislation at this session and in this bill, we might waive the rule which requires a conference committee to act only upon such matters as there was a difference upon between the two Houses and upon matters which had passed one or the other House. That is all the reason I have for having said as much as I have upon the matter.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there are but two words in the amendment, I think. It is not the importance of the words, either, that makes me object to the amendment, as they call it; but if the conference committee are authorized to put in these words, they are authorized to put in any other words they desire, whenever it shall appear to the members of the committee that it would be a wise and judicious and proper thing to do. What I want the Senator from Texas to understand is that he is enacting a law. It is true that there is not much of it, but the principle is the same as if it contained half a dozen pages; and if you can do that, you can enact a law that has never been considered by either branch of the National Legislature, has not been read the first time, the second time, or the third time, and upon which there has been no discussion. Does the Senator from Texas think we should destroy that principle of constitutional law that a bill must be read and must be voted on here simply because, forsooth, somebody may say the Senate and the House ex industria left themselves out of a penal statute?

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am now ready to vote for a resolution—a joint resolution, a measure that has the force of law, or a statute, or in any other way—carrying out the purpose of this amendment, but I am not in favor of creating here a precedent or admitting that under any press of circumstances, no matter how great, we will relax the rule that legislation shall come to us as the Constitution of the United States provides it shall and in no other way.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Colorado will not withdraw his point of order, because, while I sympathize with the Senator from Texas and feel that it is unfortunate that these words "including Representatives and Senators" were not put in, I wish to call his attention to something that happened in this body some seven or eight years ago under similar circumstances, except that the committee of conference were not open, and I thought were not clean. I used the word "clean" once before in regard to their action. It was a sneaky, dirty trick which was played by some one; I do not know by whom.

But in a conference report a provision was sneaked in and went through here—it was never considered or read in the Senate—authorizing the Attorney-General to sue the State of South Carolina on some old Indian bonds. That shows the importance of not allowing a conference committee to legislate, no matter how much needed the legislation may be. It is no trouble to have a law amended. The President notified us the other day in regard to a joint resolution of inquiry that we had omitted a very important part of it. He thought so; I did not. Some Senators agreed with him, and some did not, but all the same we amended the joint resolution so as to strengthen it in the place where he said it was weak.

It will be very easy to amend this proposed law. The Senator can move to amend it, or he can take the report back; just get it away from the conference committee, if that can be done. However, if it can not be done, let us pass it just as the two Houses have passed it, and then amend the law immediately, so as to provide that Senators and Representatives shall not be exempted. But we should not allow any conference committee to legislate here.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I feel very confident that the conference committee would not have presented this matter if we had thought it would bring forward such a strong appeal for the sacred rules of the Senate. We talked about that matter a little, and I think it is true that not a day passes, while this body is in session, that we do not break the rules of the Senate. We have a right to set aside the rules of the Senate.

The conference committee in this case do not present the conference report without an explanation. We do not present the report as a finality. The wording of the report itself says that the conference committee asks the judgment of the two Houses on this particular point. If the judgment of the two Houses is that Members of Congress ought not to be included in the proposed law at this time, the conference committee is more than content to take back the report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is begging the question. The Senator ought not to feel at all sensitive about it, because having made the explanation——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just a moment there. The Senator from Wyoming has just said that the conference committee are not at all sensitive about it. They are perfectly willing to take back the report if that is the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. The judgment of the Senate is, it ought to go in, but not in this way.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. All that it asks is the judgment of the Senate as to this particular thing. That is why we brought in the report; that is what we are waiting for, and there is no sensitiveness whatever about it.

But I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that an objection does not send the bill back to conference. An objection, under the rules of this body and the precedents of this body, only calls forth the judgment of the Senate upon the report. A single objection in the other House, as I stated, or a point of order, I understand, does send it back. But the objection here simply does what the committee asks—gives us the judgment of the Senate upon that point.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I trust the Senate will pardon another word. I think the Senator from South Carolina has omitted a consideration which properly enters into this matter, and to suggest it I will read a portion of the second section—just the point of dispute:

> Every officer or employee of the United States and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any Department or office of the Government thereof who shall, etc.

This is rather broad language. It not only includes any officer, by that designation, but provides that any person who, acting for or on behalf of the United States in an official capacity, shall do so and so shall be guilty of a certain offense. The point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina is that in a popular sense, for instance, or in a qualified sense, a Senator or a Representative is acting in an official capacity on behalf of the United States when we legislate, though in strictness of constitutional law they are said to be officers of the State.

In order to clear up that difficulty and to present the matter fairly and frankly to the Senate, the committee suggest that they are in doubt as to whether the words "and every Member of Congress" would add to the statute. On the contrary, it might be suggested that it was simply explanatory of what the two Houses of Congress had theretofore intended to do and attempted to do. I submit, Mr. President, that we ought to consider that feature, if I have made myself clear upon it, in determining whether the technical rule, supposing we have violated it by bringing this report here, ought not to be set aside by the unanimous consent of the Senate and those words, which in a strictly technical sense it is conceded ought to be included, inserted in order to include each Member of the House and each member of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Texas does not understand me as objecting to what he is trying to accomplish?

Mr. CULBERSON. Not at all. But my point—I may not be able to make it clear—is that the insertion of these words in a certain sense adds nothing to the law——

Mr. TELLER. Then leave them out.

Mr. CULBERSON. But makes it clearer; and in order to guard against any doubt upon that subject we suggest that those words go in, so that the statute may be complete and may include all persons who ought to come within its inhibition.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, certainly this is an unusual proposition and seems to establish a precedent that is rather dangerous. I should like to suggest to the Senator in charge of the conference report whether it would cause any material delay or make any material difference really if he would withhold the conference report until the two Houses can pass a concurrent resolution authorizing the conference committee to insert these words? Then the words will have gone through and taken the usual course, and the conference committee will have the authority to do it. It could not be a matter of more than twenty-four or forty-eight hours, and it will save the establishment of what I can not help but believe is a dangerous precedent.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the difference in substance between authorizing it now, while the conference report is here, and authorizing it after the matter goes back to the conferees?

Mr. LODGE. I think there is a great deal of difference in substance. If conference committees are to have the power to come in here and propose new legislation on which the minds of the House have never met and which has never passed the Houses in due process, there will be no end to the amount of legislation that will be proposed, and it will pass according as the majority will rally to the conference committee. If we put this through in the form of a joint or a concurrent resolution, authorizing the committee to do it, it takes the regular course, just like any other legislation of that kind, and it protects us from establishing what I think might easily fall into a dangerous precedent.

Mr. BACON. I desire to suggest to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that if it was attempted to have this passed by a vote in the Senate what he says as to its being an unfortunate precedent would certainly be eminently correct; but, as I understand the committee, they have recognized from the beginning that this could only be done by unanimous consent, and nothing which requires unanimous consent——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. That has been refused. Moreover, the point of order does not lie in the Senate as it does in the House. It ought to lie in the Senate and be fatal, but it does not, under our rule.

Mr. BACON. I understand unanimous consent has been refused, and the Senator from Texas says he recognizes that, in view of the objection of the Senator from Colorado, it can not be acted upon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not think the committee understand that. The committee understand that the well-established precedents in this body are that a conference report does not go back upon a mere objection.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I understand that, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But it goes back at the will of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I have said—that one objection has no effect.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. So I understood.

Mr. LODGE. The only question in order is the question of consideration.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not misunderstand me. I do not mean to suggest that, according to any regular rule, in acting upon conference reports, unanimous consent is needed, but I understood the Senators to present this report to the Senate with the recognition on their part that it was outside of the regular rule, and that unanimous consent would be required. I may be mistaken as to their presentation of that matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. The point I tried to make does not seem to impress some of my brethren here, and that is that other conferences might not be so open and square in dealing with us. I instanced a case in which totally new and strange and unheard of provisions were incorporated in a conference report. They never had been considered by either branch of Congress. They were passed through without anyone here detecting it. They became a law. Now, if we squint even toward not upholding our rules and not requiring conferees to understand their limitations, we certainly will throw down the barriers and we will have legislation by conferees. That is what we are trying to prevent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that, but it seems to me exceedingly unfortunate that that rule should be strictly invoked against this particular measure.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is exceedingly unfortunate that some one did not discover the omission of these words from the act when it was on its passage. But I contend that we can better remedy it by an amendment or by a concurrent resolution, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, authorizing the conferees of the Senate to agree to the incorporation of these words, than we can afford to let it go through in this way. It may appear a small thing, but a small spark sometimes kindles a great fire.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the proper motion, in order to get rid of this matter, would be to move to disagree. Of course, I have no more interest in this matter than has anyone else. I raised the objection because this proceeding is out of order, because it would tend to establish a precedent which would be very dangerous in the future, and because I believe it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Every Senator here agrees that the committee had not any right to insert the words, and I think the committee knew they had not any right, but thought perhaps the Senate might waive the objection in this case. I am not disposed to waive it. Having made my objection, I leave the committee to take such steps with their report as they see fit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report submitted by the conference committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is there a point of order pending? Will a point of order lie against it? Will the Chair please rule, the matter having been brought to its attention, whether it is within the province and power of a conference committee to incorporate new legislation?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think that a point of order would lie against a conference report.

Mr. LODGE. Not according to our rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a matter for the acceptance or rejection of the Senate. If the Chair sustained or overruled the point of order, it would find itself in the position of determining matters entirely within the control of the Senate. In the opinion of the Chair the question is on agreeing to the report submitted.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest to the Senator who submitted this report that he let it go over until to-morrow——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. And let us see if we can not devise a way to remedy this difficulty.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no objection to that course. There is no immediate haste.

Mr. SPOONER. That ought to be done.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let it lie upon the table until it is called up.

Mr. PERKINS. If this matter is to go over till to-morrow, we may resume, I trust, the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming desire to withdraw the conference report?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire that it shall lie upon the table subject to call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the bill as it came from the House provided "for the construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, $600,000," and to this the Senate committee has added the amendment—

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended at Subig Bay, Philippine Islands.

I assume that that brings up the controversy between Cavite, adjoining Manila, and Subig Bay, as to which shall constitute the great naval station and commercial base of the future.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that while that may be the inference, it is not what influenced the Committee on Appropriations in providing that no part of this sum shall be expended at Subig Bay. What influenced the committee was that the amount, $600,000, was too little to erect necessary works for defense of Subig Bay, and, second, that there is nothing at present in Subig Bay that needs protection, while the Hawaiian Islands and Manila Bay should be fortified at once.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But still, Mr. President, it raises the question whether these fortifications should be centered at Cavite, adjoining Manila, or Subig Bay, and there is a controversy between the Army and the Navy upon that question.

Until recently it was universally conceded that the fortifications should be centered in Subig Bay. Admiral Dewey, with a board of naval officers, made a report in favor of Subig Bay as the naval station of the future. That report was made some years ago, and the Navy Department, in pursuance of that report and in pursuance of legislative action upon the subject, has been making plans with reference to the construction of works of fortification at Subig Bay. It is only recently, I believe, that the Army has taken a position against that assumed by the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. It would be wrong for me to permit the Senator to make that statement unchallenged. This is not a difference between the Army and the Navy. A great many Army officers believe in Subig Bay as a great naval base. On the other hand, a great many naval officers believe that it is not yet time to take up the matter of Subig Bay. So there is a divided opinion in both the Navy and the Army, but it is in nowise a contest between the Navy and the Army as such. It is in nowise a contest of this kind on the part of the Committee on Appropriations that reports this bill. There is no member of the Committee on Appropriations who is not ready to take up the matter of Subig Bay and finally fortify it, if the Navy shall eventually choose that course and show that the works and fortifications there will be necessary. They do believe that we should wait until we have an estimate, so as to know what it will cost to fortify that bay, as well as what the naval expenditures there will be.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It may be, Mr. President, that there is a difference of opinion amongst naval officers as to whether these works should be centered at Subig Bay or at Manila, but I am sure I am safe in saying that a preponderance of the sentiment of the naval officers, and particularly of those who have carefully examined the matter, is in favor of Subig Bay. I am also correct in saying that whilst there is a difference of opinion in the Army upon this question possibly the preponderance of sentiment in the Army is in favor of Cavite. So we have this contest going on.

Whilst the Taft party was in the Philippines during the past summer the matter was discussed there. General Corbin and, I believe, General Wood are strongly in favor of having all these works centered at Cavite. The Taft party inspected Cavite and Subig Bay, with a view of enabling them to arrive at some judgment and conclusion regarding them.

So, I say, we have here a provision which, in part at least, decides against Subig Bay and decides in favor of Cavite, for the bill as it stands with this amendment will permit the entire $600,000 provided for by the bill to be expended at Cavite.

I submit that whilst this is a matter of controversy, and until the plans are fully presented to the Congress of the United States, and until we have an opportunity of reaching a deliberate judgment upon this question, it is unwise for Congress to permit any money whatever to be expended at Cavite. Yet under the bill the whole of it, or very nearly the whole of it, could be expended there.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator evidently has overlooked the language of the bill. The bill provides for seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian Islands, and provides for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true. They could spend $1 in the Hawaiian Islands and $599,999 in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WARREN. It could all be expended in Subig Bay if needed, but it is not expected that any such course would be taken. I wish to say again—I have said it several times—Senators insist upon intended fortifications at Cavite. There is no intention of fortifying Cavite with this appropriation. It is simply to fortify the mouth of Manila Bay, and that of course fortifies, generally speaking, Manila and Cavite. If we went on exactly as is proposed by Admiral Dewey with Subig Bay we would still have to fortify Manila Bay, but not Cavite by itself.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Still, I insist, Mr. President, that we have not had such plans presented to us with reference to fortifications in the Philippine Islands as to enable us to form a judgment upon the question, and we are now asked by this fragmentary legislation to gradually commit the United States to the construction of fortifications at this place or that without having the plans presented to Congress which are necessary to enable it to form a judgment.

We have not yet determined whether we want any fortifications in the Philippine Islands and we are not in a position yet to determine that matter. We will have to consider the question of a coast line of the Philippine Islands larger than that of the entire United States, and we will have to consider the question as to whether, if we enter upon the fortification of those islands, it will not involve an expenditure in the end larger than that already accomplished in the coast defense of the United States. We will have to consider the question as to whether the fleet itself is not ample protection to those islands and whether it is not the most economical and the most adjustable protection of those islands. It seems to me we ought to have this entire question, in all its comprehension, presented to the Senate of the United States and not have it presented in this piecemeal way.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] says that this opposition is a suggestion that we intend to give up those islands; and he announced it as his opinion that the American people will never give up anything that they have acquired, that they will never give up land or anything unless they obtain something in return.

Mr. President, that will depend upon the question as to whether the United States will act according to the usual rules of wisdom or not. The Senator's expression would intend us to believe that his view is that when a nation has once gone wrong it should always stay wrong. I heard a Senator in the Philippine Islands say the United States never took a step backward. I presume he would say that if he fell into a well or if he advanced into a quicksand. I assume that the United States, this great nation, will act as an individual under similar circumstances, and when its attention is called to action that may have been immature and unwise it will act upon judgment and reflection, whether that action involves going forward or going backward.

But there is one thing which has not yet been determined by the American people, and that is that we intend to hold permanently to the Philippines. Until we adopt a permanent policy regarding the Philippine Islands, I insist upon it that it is folly to commence a system of fortifications in those islands which, according to the testimony of some, will take from fifty to one hundred or one hundred and fifty million dollars.

When the treaty with Spain was ratified, what did the Senate say by solemn resolution? There were two resolutions voted for, one the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the other the resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. One resolution declared it to be our purpose not to hold permanent sovereignty of the Philippines, but to withdraw and give over the government of those islands to its own people. The other also declared that it was not our purpose to hold permanent sovereignty of the Philippines; that it was not a part of our policy to make the Philippines an integral part of the United States. Whilst the Senate differed as to a declaration regarding the final disposition of the islands, there was a unanimous vote in the Senate that these islands were not to be held as an integral part of the United States, those who voted for the treaty insisting upon it that they were to be disposed of hereafter in a manner best suited to the interests of the people of the Philippine Islands and the people of the United States, the minority members insisting that they were to be held only for a brief time, with a view to turning over the government to the Filipino people.

So we stand of record, when the treaty with Spain was adopted, declaring against holding these islands as an integral part of the United States, and that declaration received the vote of every man in the Senate.

Now, have we made any declaration to the contrary? And what are the declarations of the parties regarding the subject? The Democratic party has uniformly taken the position that those islands are to be held in trust for their own people; that we are discharging the powers of sovereignty there in trust for the Filipino people, and that those powers are to be turned over to the Filipino people themselves.

What is the declaration now of the Republican party? That we hold these islands in trust for civilization and for the Filipino people; that we hold them simply because the Filipino people are not fitted for self-government, with the corresponding implication that when the Filipino people are prepared for self-government the government of those islands will be turned over to them.

And what are the declarations of the leading men in the Republican party charged with the enforcement of the policy regarding the Philippine Islands? Secretary Taft has uniformly declared throughout the Philippine Islands that our only right and our only duty and our only obligation there is to prepare those people for self-government; and with that view we are instructing them in a common language and teaching them the principles of self-government.

It is true he is indefinite as to the period of withdrawal. Why? Simply because he says it is impossible to tell when they will be prepared for self-government. Inasmuch as their preparation for that function is indefinite, he insists that the declaration itself shall be indefinite so far as time is concerned.

And what does the President of the United States say upon this subject? In a recent message touching upon the Philippine question he declared that it was the hope and the trust of our people that ultimately the Philippine Islands shall bear the same relation toward us that Cuba now does. What relation does Cuba bear to us? That of an independent Republic, protected by us, but having all the qualities that belong to self-government, with certain limitations imposed upon them by her own constitution and by her treaty with us, limitations simply involving our power to protect her against her own folly in the creation of debt and in the sanitation of the islands.

Now, Mr. President, if that be the ultimate purpose of the Republican party, as represented by its Chief Executive, what does it mean? Why, that those islands are to be held as a separate entity, absolutely distinct from the United States, with their own laws, with their own government, bound to us only by a single tie, and that is the commission that governs them, that commission ultimately but progressively to give way to a government of their own people when the Philippine Islands shall have acquired a common language and shall have acquired fitness for self-government.

If these islands are not to be held as an integral part of the United States, and if both parties unite in the assumption that they are to be held for the exercise of the powers of sovereignty there by the people themselves at some time or another, I ask whether it is a wise thing for us to expend millions and tens of millions and hundreds of millions in fortifying those islands, as if we intended permanently to retain them? Is it not the wise policy simply to maintain some port like Subig Bay or Batan Island as a naval station and coaling station in the future, to be held as a part of the great chain of naval stations and coaling stations throughout the world acquired by us without dependent peoples?

Now, there are two points that can be selected as a reservation when the time comes for withdrawal. One is Subig Bay, in the northern part of the island of Luzon, nearest to Hongkong. The other is Batan Island, lying to the southeast of Luzon. Batan has the advantage of being absolutely separated by water from the rest of the Philippine Islands; it has the advantage of having almost no population; it has the advantage of having large coal fields, and it has the advantage of a great port. So it has all the advantages, except, perhaps, the location, that the island of Hongkong has to the British Empire. That island has only come into prominence lately as a commercial station or naval station, and it adds to the advantages of Subig Bay the advantage of having great coal deposits of immense value.

As to Subig Bay, it is true it is a part of the great island of Luzon, but it is separated from the rest of the island by high mountains, and immediately around this bay there is a very sparse population, I believe, not aggregating more than 3,000 people. So with these high mountains encircling it, it can be easily protected against the rest of the island, and the harbor itself is one of exceptional capacity.

If we are to have a naval station, a commercial and coaling station, after we part from the Philippine Islands, it must necessarily be either Subig Bay—"Olongapo," as it is called—or the island of Batan. If we are to retain such a naval station, it is essential that we should center every dollar of our military expenditure upon that station.

Now, Mr. President, we are beginning to realize that there is no money in the Philippines. Different motives led the American people to hold on to the Philippines. The commercial sentiment was, of course, the strongest—the commercial sentiment united with the religious sentiment and an unthinking altruism regarding the holding of these islands. The church people wished to hold them because they wished to Christianize them. They now begin to realize that they are Christianized; that they are under the control of the Catholic Church, and they are likely to remain there. The Catholic Church is doing good work amongst them.

So far as the commercial sentiment of the country is concerned, we are beginning to realize that there is no money in the Philippines. There is no money in the Tropics anywhere. The temperate region has robbed the Tropics of their oldtime monopoly in certain products, so that to-day in the Temperate Zone we are producing sugar and tobacco, which used to be the monopoly of the Torrid Zone, a monopoly from which they made large profits; and we are beginning to realize that production can not be stimulated in the Tropics without either slave labor or forced labor. So the commercial sentiment of the country is beginning to realize that there is no money in the Philippines.

As to the altruists, their views are all tending to the conclusion that the best thing to do is to leave the government of those islands to their own people; that a democracy has no right to impose government by force upon people struggling to be a democracy; that a government of the people and for the people and by the people can not maintain anywhere consistent with its traditions a government by force.

Mr. President, the sentiment of this country is gradually growing in favor of the relinquishment of the Philippines, and we are now reaching a point where we can view the whole question in a nonpartisan spirit. The two parties are approaching each other upon this question. The declarations of the President and of Secretary Taft resemble the declarations which were made in the Bacon resolution, upon which the Democrats voted three or four years ago. So I insist upon it that it would be the highest folly for us to expend large sums of money in islands which we may yet withdraw from, and which we probably will withdraw from; and it is good judgment only to center our expenditures at a point which is likely to be held as a part of our commercial system in the future.

I am in hearty sympathy with this amendment to strike out all of the paragraph relating to the Philippine Islands, so that this entire appropriation will be for the Hawaiian Islands alone; and then later on we will consider our policy with reference to the Philippine Islands. We are about to consider it very soon in questions relating to the tariff. We will probably be called upon to consider it very soon in estimates for appropriations that will come from the War and Navy Departments with reference to comprehensive plans relating to the military and naval improvements there. It seems to me to be the height of wisdom to strike out from this bill every appropriation that relates to the Philippine Islands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will allow the committee amendments to go over. It is entirely dependent upon the other amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I certainly will place no obstacle in the way of a fair expression of the Senate upon the amendment proposed by the committee; but if on the desire of the Senator it is to be temporarily passed over, I should like first to make a few remarks in reply to one of his charges that this would be a wasteful expenditure of money. I will state that the estimate in the Book of Estimates, made originally by the Secretary of War, was, for Manila, $2,000,000, which was reduced to $500,000; for Subig Bay, $500,000, which was reduced to $240,000, and for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor, $520,000, which was reduced to $260,000. In the bill we simply provide that this money shall not be expended in Subig Bay, for the reasons which have been stated over and over again. We have no plan, no system, that has been adopted for the fortification of that port, and the money already appropriated has not yet been used.

But I think it would be unwise to accept the amendment to strike out the appropriation for the Philippine Islands. We have already spent nearly $3,000,000 on fortifications at the island of Corregidor, and the estimate required to complete them is $2,000,000; not, as has been stated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] so pertinently, for the fortification of Manila Bay, but for the defense of the great city of Manila, with a population of nearly a quarter of a million.

I want to answer the Senator from Wisconsin, who asked me the question before leaving the Chamber, why it was particular ports were named in this bill, when heretofore we have made these appropriations, as he understood it, in bulk for the Board of Fortifications and Ordnance to expend? That is very true, Mr. President. In 1883, in March, I think it was, Congress provided for the appointment of a Board of Coast Defense, consisting of the Secretary of War, two engineer officers, two ordnance officers, and two civilians. We made, however, no appropriations for their work until 1888. At that time the board organized and was known as "the Endicott Board." That Board completed a plan for each port—twenty-two ports in the United States, on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast, with detailed plans for each one of those ports. Under those plans we have expended $120,000,000, in round numbers; $65,000,000 have gone for emplacements and guns, and the other $55,000,000 have been expended in the purchase of sites for torpedo stations, arsenals, and other accessories that were necessary for use in connection with the fortification of the different ports.

On January 31, 1905, the President, by authority of Congress, appointed a new board to revise the plans of the Endicott Board, and as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has read, they have classified them, and twenty-nine different ports, I think, have been named; among them, as he states, Subig as one which they have recommended should be fortified. They have left out quite a number of other places—I have in mind one in the State which I have the honor in part to represent—the great city of Los Angeles, in a county containing three or four hundred thousand people, on the harbor of which, San Pedro, the Government has expended over $3,000,000 in building a sea wall and a harbor of refuge; yet that is not embraced in the places provided for. I only refer to it incidentally in passing. I wish to show that the plan of that Board has not yet been fully matured. As evidence of that, they give us no recommendation, no estimates, no plans for the fortification of our insular possessions.

California, Mr. President, is one of the brightest gems in our constellation of States. Pardon me for alluding to it in endearing terms. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] regrets that he is not a resident of that State or a citizen of it. True they may not send their best men to represent them in Congress, but they send men who are loyal to the great interests of their people. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that, if he lived there long enough, he might have a chance to represent that State. If we could have the benefit of his great learning and his great experience, I am sure it would add tenfold to the result of the work that her present representatives have been able to accomplish.

Mr. LODGE. Is that not a digression?

Mr. PERKINS. True, Mr. President, I am digressing. If the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts should prevail, he had better take the whole bill from your committee and revise it.

Mr. LODGE. I have not proposed any amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I thought the Senator proposed the one that is pending.

Mr. LODGE. No; the Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], a member of the Senator's own committee, has offered the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, in this bill there are $200,000 appropriated for guns for the insular possessions. The appropriations to which the Senator referred, which were made last year, were for guns which are in the process of being manufactured at the different arsenals of our country.

The reason we have named these ports this year was that a member of our committee offered the following amendment, to which we all gave our sanction:

Hereafter all estimates for fortifications of insular possessions of the United States shall be made and submitted to Congress, showing the amount proposed to be expended at each harbor in each insular possession.

That was done for the reason that much opposition developed in doing anything in our insular possessions, so far as the fortification of different ports in those possessions was concerned.

I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that, while we have appropriated this money in bulk heretofore and have left it to the Board of Coast Defenses and Fortifications, to which I have referred, yet the information which they have always furnished your committee is in print of the number of guns, the emplacements, and the number of mortars with which they intend to fortify each port. They have brought to your subcommittee the blueprints and explained them to us fully in detail; but we do not wish to publish to the world our system of defense, the number or the caliber of our guns, or the ammunition that we were to use with them.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from California did me the honor to refer to me. He does not mean to imply that I sought to secure the publication of these military secrets to the world, does he?

Mr. PERKINS. I am replying to the inquiry the Senator propounded a while ago in regard to our departure from the system which heretofore prevailed. The reason was that your committee have brought into the Senate in the past ten or twelve years, during which time I have been a member of the committee, this information in a condensed form, without going into details, and I am only endeavoring to explain why there was this year put into the bill appropriations for those ports in the insular possessions which have not heretofore appeared.

Mr. SPOONER. If it will not disturb the Senator from California, I should like to ask him a question for information.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amount of money that it is estimated will be required for fortifications in Hawaii?

Mr. PERKINS. In the Book of Estimates, which I have before me, the estimate is $2,000,000 for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor, $520,000 to be expended during the coming year; but the whole amount necessary, according to private information I have from the Department, will be two or three million dollars to fortify Honolulu Harbor and Pearl Harbor, where it is contemplated to make a naval station, as the Senator is aware.

Mr. SPOONER. The bill appropriates $600,000 for the construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. How much of that $600,000, if the Senator will be kind enough to tell me, is provided for the Philippines and how much for Hawaii?

Mr. PERKINS. About $300,000 for the Hawaiian Islands and about $300,000 for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado should be adopted, the entire sum would not be necessary?

Mr. PERKINS. Then the whole $600,000 would be expended in the Hawaiian Islands. I think it would not be advisable to adopt that amendment, for the reason that we have appropriated in this bill every dollar that the War Department desires in order to purchase sites. There has been a combination made against the Government to charge extravagant prices for the site near Pearl Harbor.

Mr. SPOONER. I prophesied a couple of years ago that that would happen.

Mr. PERKINS. For that reason, if for no other, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado should not prevail. Though he is generally very attentive, at the time this matter was being considered by the committee the Senator from Colorado had so many other duties that he was not able to be present in committee. I am satisfied if he had been there, had listened to the testimony, and investigated the subject, as we have done, that he would have been of a different opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. I have a notion that if the amendment of the Senator from Colorado be adopted, it would be eminently proper to reduce the appropriation of $600,000 for Hawaii to $300,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I think so. I think the information of the committee is that that is all that can be advantageously expended this year.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator passes from that point, I should like to inquire what progress has been made in acquiring sites for the seacoast batteries at Hawaii, and what progress has been made in acquiring the necessary ground at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. PERKINS. As to several tracts of land, condemnation proceedings are now pending in the courts of Hawaii. The courts, however, move justly, but slowly at times, in our insular possessions; and so the titles have not been fully adjudicated. Other tracts have been bonded for certain sums, and it is claimed the coming year will place the Government in possession of all necessary sites which will be required in Hawaii.

Mr. SPOONER. Can the Senator estimate the sum?

Mr. PERKINS. That I am unable to say.

Mr. FORAKER. The estimated cost will not exceed, as I understand, what has already been appropriated on that account.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that the amount of money which the War Department asked for sites has been appropriated in each annual bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I am talking about the site at Pearl Harbor. As I understand it, we made an appropriation a year ago, and that appropriation has not been used.

Mr. PERKINS. That is also the case at Honolulu.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes. The appropriation heretofore made is sufficient, so far as anyone is at present advised, in all probability, to pay for all the ground that is being condemned.

Mr. PERKINS. I so understand.

Mr. FORAKER. And this appropriation is intended to cover the sites for seacoast batteries at Pearl Harbor and Honolulu. Now, how much of it, can the Senator tell us, is intended to pay for sites?

Mr. PERKINS. The amount has not been segregated, so far as I am informed, but it was estimated, in round numbers, that from two or three hundred thousand dollars could be advantageously used in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask the Senator if that did not cover not only the sites, but also a part of the cost of establishing batteries?

Mr. PERKINS. We have also provided in another place for the sites and emplacements. In one place in the bill we have provided for the manufacture of various guns of different calibers.

Mr. FORAKER. I had reference to the emplacements and the general preparation necessary to be made to receive the armament, whatever it may be. If that is provided for in another part of the bill, is it not true that a good deal more than $600,000 will be needed in order to pay for a site for these seacoast batteries and for the erection of emplacements and the necessary preparation to receive the armament?

Mr. PERKINS. It will require about a million and a half to two million dollars more; but it will not be necessary to make that available for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what is the plan of the War Department.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state also to the Senator as to the guns the War Department is considering the advisability of increasing the caliber of coast-defense guns from 12 to 14 inches. It is said that with the high explosives which they use in the 14-inch gun they will get 50 per cent more power, more energy, more force, and more destructive ability than from the 12-inch gun. The 14-inch gun will expel a shell from the muzzle of the gun 2,550 feet per second, going with an energy as it is expelled from the gun of 47½ tons, carrying nearly 5 miles, and penetrating steel armor of 12 inches in thickness at that distance.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I want to ascertain from the Senator from California—I should like to, at any rate, before he takes his seat—what, in his judgment, will be a sufficient sum to appropriate for these seacoast batteries in Hawaii? I supposed that it was the purpose of the War Department to acquire the sites and proceed at once to the preparation necessary for receiving the armanent, and that they were perhaps limiting the appropriation on account of sites for seacoast batteries only because of this general plan, which was requiring so much money. But it seems to me that the amount of $600,000, if I am correctly advised, could all be used to good advantage. I think they will go right forward with their work, acquire sites, and make the preparations necessary for receiving the armanent. The Senator, however, knows more about that than I do.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I will say that your committee are in full accord with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and feel that every dollar that can be advantageously expended in fortifying this very desirable point in the Hawaiian Islands should be used. Their information is presented in their report to the Senate that this $600,000 should be divided according to the judgment of this new Board of Fortifications and Ordnance, consisting of the Secretary of War, Hon. William H. Taft, Lieutenant-General Chaffee, Major-General Greely, General Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of Artillery, the Chief of Engineers, two members of the Navy, Rear-Admiral Thomas and Captain Sperry, and also a distinguished Army officer as secretary of the Board. This report only reached us a few days since. It was not printed, and therefore your committee did not have an opportunity of examining it at that time.

Mr. CLAY. I do not understand the Senator to say that $600,000 could be advantageously spent in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. PERKINS. I stated that your committee were advised that two or three hundred thousand dollars was all that could be expended advantageously in the Hawaiian Islands during the coming year.

Mr. CLAY. I know the Senator is aware of the fact that the last Congress in passing the fortifications appropriation bill especially provided that an itemized statement should be furnished to the Committee on Appropriations of how much money should be spent in each one of these harbors in the future; and really, I believe that the appropriation bill ought to specify how much money is to be spent on each harbor.

I know the Senator is perfectly familiar with the fact that the Secretary of War only asked for $260,000 for the Hawaiian Islands. He asked for $500,000 for Manila and for $260,000 for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor, and he himself says that is the amount of money that can be advantageously expended there next year. Consequently, if that amendment should prevail, it would be necessary to decrease the appropriation from $600,000 to $260,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Only $520,000 was asked for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor. That was reduced to $260,000 in the Book of Estimates, which the Senator has quoted.

Mr. CLAY. That is correct—$260,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Therefore, I reiterate that which has been stated again and again, that I do not think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado should prevail. I believe that if the Senate should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole and examine the testimony which we had before us in the committee—testimony which we can not present without giving too much publicity to it—they would agree with the conclusions at which your committee have arrived.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks a part of this fund should be appropriated to the fortification of Cavite?

Mr. PERKINS. I do, most certainly. There is no question about it. It is true that my friend from Georgia——

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of Corregidor Island; I am speaking of Cavite itself.

Mr. PERKINS. I am speaking of Corregidor Island.

Mr. BACON. That is 30 miles from Cavite.

Mr. PERKINS. Aye; but it guards the entrance to the bay.

Mr. BACON. I did not misunderstand the Senator, but he misunderstood me. I am not speaking of Corregidor Island.

Mr. PERKINS. I am not advised as to Cavite. We have, however, a naval station there; we have machine shops there, and the testimony of the Bureau of Equipment and the Bureau of Yards and Docks is that it is ample for all purposes at this time.

Mr. BACON. I had reference especially to Cavite itself, not to the island of Corregidor.

Mr. PERKINS. I can not speak as to that.

Mr. WARREN. I had the privilege of looking over the plans for the islands. There was nothing proposed for Cavite, as has been stated a great many times on the floor; but it is proposed to fortify the entrance to Manila Bay, which, of course, protects Cavite as well as Manila. I do not understand there is a dollar to be expended on fortifications at Cavite proper from this proposed appropriation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts requested that the amendment under consideration should be passed over temporarily.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection to the amendment being passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at page 8, line 9. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 8, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "five hundred and sixty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense for the insular possessions, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $565,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment which was passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, beginning on line 8, the committee propose to insert the following:

POWDER FACTORY.

For the erection and equipment of a powder factory, with its necessary communications and accessory structures, upon such reservation now or that may hereafter be under the control of the War Department as may be selected by the Secretary of War, $125,000.

Mr. PERKINS. At the request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], I will ask that the consideration of that amendment go over until to-morrow morning, when we will take it up immediately after the routine morning business. The Senator from Virginia desires to make some remarks in relation to this subject-matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be passed over. The next amendment which was passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, under the heading "Fortifications in insular possessions," line 6, after the word "dollars," the committee propose to insert:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended at Subig Bay, Philippine Islands.

So as to make the clause read:

For construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, $600,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended at Subig Bay, Philippine Islands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. PERKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from California that we first take a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to save time. That will settle the whole question.

Mr. PERKINS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the vote will be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 6, before the word "Islands," it is proposed by Mr. TELLER to strike out the words "and Philippines;" so as to read:

For construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian Islands, $600,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] that we transfer our pairs, which will allow us both to vote. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If it is agreeable to the Senator we can transfer our pairs, so that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will stand paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE].

Mr. PATTERSON. That is quite agreeable to me.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I vote "nay."

Mr. PATTERSON. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—25.

So Mr. TELLER's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PERKINS. The amendment is not necessary, as by the vote of the Senate there has been stricken out all appropriations for fortifications in the Philippine Islands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator withdraw the amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to call attention to the fact that as this clause now stands it reads "for construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian Islands, $600,000." The estimate of the War Department is only $200,000. I move to strike out "$600,000" and insert "$200,000."

Mr. PERKINS. I accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 6, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "six hundred" and insert "two hundred and sixty;" so as to read "$200,000."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I request that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, for the purpose of giving the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] an opportunity to make a speech on the powder question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the bill will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is the only question in abeyance, why would it not be wise to have the bill reported to the Senate——

Mr. PERKINS. There is no objection to that.

Mr. ALLISON. And leave the one amendment undisposed of?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa is a good one. Therefore I suggest that the bill be reported to the Senate, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. That perhaps can not be done, leaving one amendment in the air. I suggest to the Senator that he ask unanimous consent that this shall be the only matter left for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Agree to all the other amendments and leave this one open.

Mr. ALLISON. Agree to all the other amendments, so that the bill can be taken out of the Committee of the Whole when this single amendment is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will kindly restate his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered closed in Committee of the Whole, all the amendments having been agreed to except the amendment relative to the powder matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call attention to the amendment on page 8, line 16, where there is quite a large increase over the amount authorized by the bill as it passed the House. The Philippine Islands having been stricken out——

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the Senator that has been agreed to, and an explanation was made at the time. It does not disturb the autonomy of the bill at all to have it remain as it is.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa there may be other matters in connection with this bill that we would like to keep open until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa for unanimous consent?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There are other items in the bill which I should like to discuss to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I would be glad if the Senator from California would go on with the other amendments this evening.

Mr. LODGE. And finish the rest of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I think we had better perfect the bill this evening.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Now the Senator from Indiana can offer any amendment he desires.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the Senator that I would like to look into the amendments I have in view, and if the bill is to go over as to one amendment, I see no reason why it should not go over as to the others, so that Senators may have an opportunity to look into them.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over till to-morrow.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator from North Dakota to yield to me that I may call up a concurrent resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask if unanimous consent has been given.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been given.

Mr. McCUMBER. After that is given, I will yield to the Senator, if there is no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

Mr. PENROSE. With the consent of the Senator from North Dakota, I ask unanimous consent to call up the concurrent resolution relating to the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. PENROSE on the 13th instant, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "Pennsylvania," to insert "commencing;" so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the invitation extended to the Congress of the United States by the American Philosophical Society of Philadelphia, Pa., to attend the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, to be held at Philadelphia, Pa., commencing April 17, 1906, be, and is hereby, accepted.

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee to consist of six Senators and ten Representatives of the Fifty-ninth Congress to attend the celebration referred to and to represent the Congress of the United States on that occasion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me to call up a bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator from Maine that quite a number of Senators have requested that I yield to them for the purpose of calling up bills, and I have said to them that the pension appropriation bill is probably shorter than theirs.

Mr. FRYE. Very well. I withdraw the request.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read to the end of line 9, on page 8.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota desire that the committee amendment shall be considered when it is reached in the reading of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I prefer it should be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 2, line 7, before the word "age," to insert "the;" and in the same line, after the word "age," to strike out "is" and insert "of 62 years and over shall be considered;" so as to read:

And provided further, That the age of 62 years and over shall be considered a permanent specific disability within the meaning of the pension laws.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator who has this bill in charge whether that would give to every soldier who is 62 years of age a pension if he asks for it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it will.

Mr. TELLER. That is the purpose of the provision?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not quarrel with the purpose at all. I merely wanted to know.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have thought it proper to make a very brief statement concerning this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to offer an amendment before he makes his statement?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the word "laws," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

And provided further, That hereafter in the adjudication of pension claims under the general law the soldier shall not be required to prove the continuance of the alleged disability or disabilities from the date of his discharge from the service to the time application is made for pension or increase of pension, it being sufficient for him to show that the disability was incurred in the service and line of duty and that it exists at the time of medical examination.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator having charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, has listened to the amendment with sufficient attention to say that he sees no objection to it, I will not detain the Senate a moment. I will say, however, that the amendment, hastily drawn, and which, if it is inserted in the bill, will go into conference, is designed to cover a very few cases. I have here a letter from a Massachusetts soldier which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD, detailing his experience in the Pension Bureau.

There is a class of soldiers who when they left the service suffering from disabilities were too proud to ask for pensions. Some of them did not need the money, and others felt that it was not quite the patriotic thing to do. Their disabilities were unquestioned at the time they left the service. Forty or forty-five years after that time they become impoverished. They go to the Pension Bureau and ask for a pension, and they are required by the Bureau to prove the continuance, year by year, of that disability. It is not sufficient that it exists to-day, but they must prove absolutely that it has existed year by year. The medical men who treated them are dead, as a rule, and it is an utter impossibility for them to establish this proof.

It seems to me if they can show by hospital record or otherwise that they were disabled when they left the service, in the line of duty, and when they make application for a pension or increase of pension can show that the same disability exists, that ought to be enough. That is the purport of the amendment, and I hope the Senator will not object to it and will let it become a part of the bill and go into conference at least.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection whatever to the amendment. I tried to listen carefully to its reading, and I think it covers the intended object.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk be inserted in the RECORD. It explains one case very fully, and it impressed me so profoundly, I having thought of this in former years, that I felt necessity existed for amending the bill in this way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire.
